A GROUP OF WORKERS THE COMPOUND OF THE COMET MINE PUPILS IN THE [illegible] REEF SCHOOL

THE GOSPEL IN AFRICAN COMPOUNDS

FROM the wonderful region of the Transvaal, familiar to our ears four years ago, with its associations of battle and bloodshed, comes a thrilling story of missionary labor and of victories won by the preaching of the Gospel of the Prince of Peace. The work, like so much that has been done in Christ's name in various parts of the world, had its origin in the spectacle of urgent need, and of opportunities of winning souls, which were being lost because no one was specially assigned to the duty of using them. An earnest, consecrated man, who in his youth had been a carpenter, but had worked his way up by hard study to be a lawyer, saw the opportunity for service, and having given himself entirely to Christ, accepted the ordination from no human hands, but from God himself, to do the work that was being left undone. He was blessed in it, and now it is organized with many helpers, and has numerous trophies to show of the power of the Gospel.

One Sunday afternoon, in the year 1895, several hundred Kaffirs were assembled in an open space near Pretoria for a general merry-making. There were dances and athletic sports, and an abundance of beer was on hand to quicken the fun, if it should flag. It was a common spectacle, for wages were good at the mines, and the native workers had sufficient tribal pride to be anxious for competition in the games. Many tribes were represented in the group, and all were alike ignorant, reckless and degraded. Mr. A. W. Baker, the lawyer already referred to, had been teaching a class in the Wesleyan Sunday School, and was on his way home when he noticed the gathering. He stood and watched the native dancers, with a call from God ringing in his ears. What an opportunity this weekly assembly afforded for the preaching of the Gospel, was the idea that it suggested. Why was no one telling these pagans the story of the Cross? This was followed by the question why he should not do it himself. He could speak Dutch and Zulu, besides English. Perhaps he could do the work as well or better, than another. In any event, he resolved to give his testimony for Christ.

The following Sunday afternoon he was at the place of merry-making, with a few of his Sunday School boys who could sing. Mounting an empty bullock-wagon, he started a hymn and then another. The Kaffirs crowded around and, when he had a large audience, he began speaking to them about Jesus. They listened, and there were evidences of an impression having been made. Addresses were given every Sunday afternoon afterwards until the rainy season set in, when a stable was rented for the meetings. From the men with whom he talked, Mr. Baker learned that no spiritual work was being attempted in any of the compounds connected with the gold mines, which were scattered along a reef sixty miles long. In these compounds there were grouped mixed companies of natives, from eight hundred to three thousand in number. They included Batonga, Zulus, Batyopi, Shangaan, Amatonga, Amaswazi, besides Barotse and other tribes from the Northwest, and Basutos and Bechuanas from the South. These men herded together, became worse under the influence of the white man. As one of the superintendents said, "They come to us savages, and they leave us fiends." A visit to Johannesburg, where Mr. Baker visited several compounds, confirmed this statement. He stayed and held a few meetings, speaking in Zulu, which appeared to be generally understood. At one of them, several natives knelt down in the ring that had been formed around the preacher and prayed for salvation. One of them asked Mr. Baker why he, who could talk to them in their own tongue, did not go to other compounds and tell their brethren the same story. He had been asking himself the same question, when he saw the effects of his simple testimony. The answer his conscience gave was naturally met with objections. He had attained his legal practice only by hard effort, and that would have to be abandoned if he took up this work. There was no prospect of support in such a mission, and he was not sure that his duty called him to so great a sacrifice. He went home and consulted with his wife, and together they committed the question to God in prayer. One other visit to the compounds of Johannesburg, about two months later, appeared to give the answer to these problems. There was such evident need for work, the people were so thankful to hear the Gospel in their own language, and the Holy Spirit was so definitely dealing with the men, that the call seemed clear. Mr. Baker went back to Pretoria, disposed of his practice, sent his wife and children to relatives in Durban until he could make a new home for them, and returned to Johannesburg to begin his work. He writes that he has had to pass through some trying times since he made his decision, but never once has he doubted that his Lord called him to undertake it.

MR. A. W. BAKER——PREACHING TO THE NATIVES IN A MINING "COMPOUND"

The City and Suburban Gold Mining Company was the first to grant permission for Gospel services, and gave Mr. Baker a lease of a plot of land on which to build a cottage for his own home. Subsequently similar permission was obtained from eleven other companies, which gave a chain of stations from the extreme east to the extreme west of the Rand. It was discouraging at first. "Strong drink," he says, "reigned supreme, and drunken orgies and faction fights were the Saturday and Sunday diversions. My heart bled to see these poor benighted souls degraded by the white man's vices." Prayer and faith supported him, and after a time prohibition came to his aid, and many converts were won for Christ. In all 125 men made public profession of conversion and were baptized.

It was a practical Gospel that Mr. Baker preached, and it had practical effects. Many of the white men scoffed at the meetings, but they were silenced, when natives who had been converted under Mr. Baker's labors, came to them to clear their consciences by making restitution for past offences. Some brought stolen money, others hatchets, buckets and tools, that had mysteriously disappeared months before. The men simply explained that they had become Christians, and could no longer keep stolen things.

The outbreak of the war put an end to the good work, by closing the mines. Mr. Baker, knowing how many of his converts came from Delagoa Bay, Gazaland, and other Portuguese territories, undertook a journey of three hundred miles on foot into those regions to see them in their own villages. During that journey he was stricken down with malarial fever, and had a narrow escape of his life. Almost like a living skeleton he returned to his field, only to find it desolated by the war and with no opportunity of resuming his work. He had received invitations from Australia and New Zealand, from Christian people who had heard what he had achieved and were anxious to have him visit them. He had not been able then to accept them, but now that he was compelled to be idle, and his health being broken and in need of a sea voyage, he availed himself of the opportunity. The visit proved beneficial. Sympathies were aroused and praise [illegible] for his mission and to supply him with additional workers.

CONVERTS REPRESENTING SIX TRIBES, WITH ONE OF THE WORKERS

With the return of peace Mr. Baker has resumed his work, and has extended it into Natal and is preparing to enter Rhodesia. It has lost none of its power. Last year 151 native converts were baptized, and this year the number will be still larger. The schools are very popular with the men, and the converts manage to learn to read the New Testament in their own language. Thousands of pounds in the Transvaal are now accumulated, and with the native preacher and native converts to assist, and these fields are still at a low ebb, hitherto they have always been provided.

A New Temperance Movement

ONE of the most remarkable Temperance Manifestoes ever issued, has just appeared in Great Britain. It is signed by the most eminent men of all classes in the country. Religion is represented by eighteen Bishops of the Established Church and one Roman Catholic Archbishop. Politicians, leading physicians, heads of universities and prominent journalists have also signed it. In all, over two hundred signatures have been affixed, and they are all of men eminent in their own special field. The object of the manifesto is to inaugurate a new Temperance Reform with a definite programme. It insists that "the present expenditure on alcohol cannot be maintained, except at a cost to the community which imperils the progress and well-being of the nation." Certain measures of a radical character are suggested for the correction of the evil. That they are final, the signers would not claim, but they would undoubtedly effect an enormous improvement. The first of these measures is a large reduction in the number of saloons. To effect this reduction without wronging the saloon-keeper, who would thus be driven out of business, it is proposed to divert the money paid for licenses from the national treasury, and use it as a separate fund from which compensation should be given to saloon-keepers deprived of their licenses. It is also proposed to fix a date after which any license issued should be subject to withdrawal without compensation. A second measure is to grant to all communities the power of local option, by which the trade might be altogether suppressed in that section, or conducted by a municipality under conditions which would preclude private or public gain.

It is gratifying to see the leading men of a nation taking up this momentous question, and dealing with it in a patriotic spirit apart from politics. The scheme is ingenious, and should command the support of the moral part of the community, which has thus a clear and definite programme to work with.

The Isthmian Revolution

WITHOUT a battle, the tiny State of Panama, with her 300,000 population, has revolted from Colombia and taken her place among the sisterhood of American republics. This is a startling novelty, even in South American politics, which is full of surprises. Ever since the Isthmus of Panama, in 1821, having severed from Spain, cast in its fortunes with the new republic of Colombia, it has found plentiful cause for grievance. Under the selfish and short-sighted policy of the Bogota government, the Isthmus was denied an equal footing with the rest of the Colombian republic, its prosperity and future development were made the plaything of political mercenaries, and its many protests were allowed to pass unheeded. Finally, when the Bogota legislators, by a political "hold-up," for the purpose of extorting from the United States a fabulous sum for canal rights, destroyed the brightest hopes of the Isthmian population, the condition of affairs in Panama became intolerable. Colombia had killed the Treaty and all that pertained to it, and our Government was left free of treaty obligations. The people of the Isthmus were a unit in favor of the Canal. Secession was decided on, as a last resort for self-preservation, and the fateful step was taken with amazing promptness.

At this juncture, or a little earlier, according to the official explanations from our own State Department, we determined to participate in the little drama on the Isthmus—but purely as a peace-maker. Prompted by the desire to protect American interests, and also to avert a clash between the Colombian troops and the people of Panama, which would have inevitably occurred, we landed a sufficient force of marines to preserve order. We duly warned the rival forces that there must be no fighting. And when, accepting our advice, the Bogotan troops sailed away, and the Isthmians proclaimed the new Republic, we gave it informal recognition, and notified Colombia that the Republic of Panama, being peacefully organized by its own voluntary act, would be protected. Under our treaty with New Granada in 1846, which guaranteed that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama, upon any modes of communication that might be constructed, should be forever free and open to the government and citizens of the United States, we have a right to take such action as is necessary to keep the Isthmus clear at all times for the transaction of the world's traffic. This is precisely what the Washington administration has done.

But here, a new dilemma arises. It is admitted on all sides that the revolution was precipitated by the hope of the Isthmians, that they would then become the beneficiaries under the Canal arrangement. But they are no nearer this than before. Under the Act of Congress of June 28, 1902, the President was empowered to "acquire from the Republic of Colombia" the control of the territory needed for canal purposes. He can deal with no other government until further legislation. Thus the whole matter, as far as the United States is concerned, must go back to Congress.

As for the opinion expressed in certain quarters, that we have established a "dangerous precedent," by interfering with the internal affairs of Colombia, and that if the latter decides to make trouble, we may find that we have touched a hornet's nest, in alienating, if not antagonizing, the Latin-American republics—we do not consider such criticism just or reasonable. The United States wants no rights or privileges on the Isthmus or anywhere else in South America, other than those that are already secured by honorable treaty. Our policy in that respect is well-known and definite. We are bound, as our State Department has explained, "not merely by treaty obligations, but by the interests of civilization, to see that the peaceable traffic of the world across the Isthmus of Panama shall no longer be disturbed by a constant succession of unnecessary and wasteful civil wars." This is excellent language, but it does not mean that we are to override any one's rights in carrying out our mission. We want the canal, but only by fair, honorable and upright measures, and not by coercive or aggrandizing methods. To take any step now that would lead to a coalition of Southern interests against us, would be gratuitous folly. Whatever others may do, let us continue to be known as a government that keeps good faith, and lives up to its professions of equal friendship for all the Western republics, from the smallest to the greatest.

What is Going on in the Sun?

ELSEWHERE in the present issue, we print the opinions of several well-known astronomers concerning the spots in the sun, which are just now attracting the attention of men of science throughout the world. There are various theories held by these scientists. Some hold that the sun-spots are eruptions; others, that they are evidence of "extra-rapid circulation within the sun's atmosphere"; and one, at least, ventures the assertion that the spots are simply openings or gaps in the luminous atmosphere which envelops the sun, and which disclose that orb, not as a luminary—as we have been accustomed to believe it—but as a "dark body." Another authority pronounces them to be "vast depressions in the solar surface, surrounded and overhung by masses and clouds of matter in the gaseous or vaporous state."

It is a very pronounced case of doctors differing. No two seem to agree as to the cause or character of the phenomenon, but all are singularly unanimous in stating what it is not. It is not a world, or star, or planet in process of creation, says science authoritatively; yet science knows nothing of the creative processes, which have studded the heaven with worlds unnumbered.

What, then, is going on in the sun, or in the sun's atmosphere? At best, the learned ones, with the advantage of all that human science teaches, can only answer in approximations and conjectures. Recently, a distinguished astronomer in England publicly declared that the sun, obeying a fundamental law, was growing smaller and colder—shrinking at the rate of nine inches daily, or 2,000 miles in 40,000 years. He did not reveal the basis of this remarkable calculation. More lately, another scientist suggested that the undiminished heat of the "orb of day" was possibly due to the presence of radium, and that it never would grow less!

There are invisible barriers in nature which human science is powerless to overcome. No telescope can ever be constructed that will reveal the ordinances of those heavens which God, by his wisdom, has founded and established. Our contemplation of these wonders should beget in us a deeper reverence for the Creator and a stronger sense of our own insignificance and our dependence upon His goodness. "Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil, that is understanding."

To Every Friend of the Friendless

AN earnest appeal comes from the Bowery Mission to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in behalf of the homeless, hungry, and helpless men who throng that highway of sin and wickedness, because misery loves company and cannot find it so abundantly elsewhere in the world. These men and boys on the Bowery are not all bad—they are not all beyond reasonable hope of reclamation; but they are unfortunate, out of employment, and friendless in a great city, where all is at such high tension, that a sympathetic and kindly interest in prodigal sons from distant homes is stifled under the suffocating pressure of the intense activities of its throbbing life. If it were not for the Bowery Mission—the Gospel Lighthouse, that already has saved from absolute shipwreck many a hapless mariner on the sea of life—the life-line would never have been thrown out to these men and boys, and thousands who to-day are happily reunited with their families, or firmly established in good positions through its blessed influence, would have gone under, "unwept, unhonored, and unsung."

The men and boys of the Bowery are the ambitious sons of reputable parents, who started out with high hopes of making their future in the great city. The peaceful little country town was too slow for them, for at best it seemed to promise but a humdrum existence. Once out in the metropolis of the Western world, they hoped soon to send word to father and mother that success had attended their efforts, that they were on their way to a fortune, and in a position to contribute to the comfort of the old folks-at home. Unfortunately they did not realize their fond hopes, and now they are ashamed to write home; and while mother is singing "Where is My Wandering Boy To-night?" and father is praying for the return of the Prodigal, and sisters are anxiously awaiting his coming, the poor fellow is walking off the heels of his boots in vain search for employment, day by day becoming more and more shabby, until, having lost faith in himself, he is now ashamed to write, ashamed to return.

Thanksgiving Day is rapidly coming on; and the Bowery Mission plans to provide a thousand of these homeless boys and men with a Thanksgiving dinner, and five thousand of them with a breakfast. For the latter, the doors of the Mission will be open at three o'clock in the morning, so as to cut short, with "the cup that cheers, but not inebriates," their nightly, comfortless tramp in the cold. A turkey dinner will be served to 500 boys on Thanksgiving Eve, and on Thanksgiving night to 500 men. Besides turkey, there will be bread and butter, cranberry sauce, apples and oranges, and all the hot coffee they care to drink.

The Bowery Mission appeals to every friend of the friendless, and to every home from which a boy is absent, out in the world, perhaps now on the Bowery, to send a mite to help this good and glorious work. We wish to raise $1,000—and if only one out of every two hundred subscribers will send us one dollar, we shall have the means to bring a ray of sunshine into 6,000 desolate hearts, and, better still, perhaps some of the boys, as is usually the case, will decide then and there that they will arise and return to their father's house, where the servants have enough to eat and bread to spare. God grant that they may.

Let all who can, help this work; it is God's work; it is helping the helpless, it is saving the lost. Send one dollar for the homeless, friendless, destitute men and boys out in the Bowery—the far country of sin and despair.

Send your contribution to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Every remittance will be acknowledged by mail and in our columns. Later, acknowledgment will be made at the Judgment. Matt. 25: 40.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Famous Historian Dead

ONE of the most learned and laborious authors in the whole world died on November 1. No one who has read history at all is unfamiliar with the name of Theodor Mommsen, whose authority is quoted with respect by all writers. He was in his eighty-sixth year, but was busy until October 30, when he was stricken with apoplexy. In the room adjoining the one in which he lay dying, was an unfinished work on which he was engaged at the time of his seizure. It was part of a series on the Lives of the Roman Emperors, and is said to prove that even at his advanced age, there was no sign in it of any decrease of mental power. He was the son of an evangelical pastor, and was educated at the University of Kiel, from which he graduated in 1843. He was a prominent journalist and Professor of Law at Leipsic, when the troubles of 1848 disturbed all Europe. Mommsen took an active part in them, which cost him his professorship. He turned his retirement to account, however, by researches which were a preparation for his work on Roman History, which brought him world-wide fame. He recovered his professorship, but was so unfortunate as to incur the hostility of Prince Bismarck. He was tried for slandering that statesman, but after a long litigation, carried from court to court, he was acquitted. During the whole time of his trouble his literary labors were continued. His historical works and his volumes on jurisprudence appeared in rapid succession. Over a hundred volumes in all he produced, and it is said that his pen must have written more than twenty-four million German words. "I did not know," the old man said when this calculation was repeated to him, "that I was so wretchedly verbose." But the world had no such charge to bring against him. Edition after edition of his works appeared in Germany, and they were translated into English, French, Italian, Russian and Spanish. His untiring patience, his persistence in seeking exact facts and dates were phenomenal, and gave his productions recognized value. Though he opposed the Emperor and said many hard things of him, his majesty heartily respected him, and expressed deep sorrow when he heard of his death. He has reason to mourn, for he has lost a faithful mentor, who had the courage of his convictions, and was never deterred by fear of the throne or the chancellor, from uttering them. A man who takes that course, even though sure he is right, has often to suffer from royal resentment. As Mommsen learned by painful experience, it is not every potentate who fulfils the wise king's assurance:

Righteous lips are the delight of kings, and they love him who speaketh right (Proverbs 16: 13).

Secession of Panama

A new complexion has been put on the canal project by the secession of the State of Panama from the United States of Colombia. The people of the State were exasperated by the conduct of the Colombian Congress, in rejecting the treaty with us. They have therefore seceded from the Union, and have declared Panama a sovereign State. Two Colombian generals, Tovar and Amaya, who represented at Panama the central Government, were seized and imprisoned, but were subsequently released on their agreeing to leave the Isthmus, and take their 450 soldiers with them. As there was a possibility of a conflict, and as a bombardment of Panama was begun by a gunboat, fifty marines were landed from our cruiser Nashville, to protect American lives and property. Our government immediately ordered other vessels to proceed to the Isthmus, and notified the Colombian government that the United States intended to preserve peace along the line of railroad, as required by treaty. Colombian troops, therefore, would not be allowed to land. If the Washington government adheres to this course, the success of the revolution is secured, as it is practically protection to the new State. This will end altogether Colombia's prospects of profit from our construction of the Isthmian Canal, as President Roosevelt will doubtless be empowered by Congress to deal with the new State of Panama. Thus by its greed, Colombia has lost territory, as well as a large sum of money.

He that is greedy of gain, troubleth his own house (Prov. 15: 27).

A House Stolen

Never were men more astonished than two clerks representing a New York Company, who paid a visit to Jersey City a few days ago. They were sent over by the Company to examine a house which it owned, and report what repairs were necessary to put it in condition for being rented. They easily found the site of the house, but no house stood there. Inquiries of the neighbors elicited the information that the house had been torn down several weeks before. A gang of men had arrived, who seemed accustomed to the work of demolishing buildings. They set to work systematically and made a complete destruction. Wagons were brought, in which the lumber, bricks and metal pipes were loaded, and were driven away. The neighbors supposed that the owners had ordered the demolition, so they did not intertere. The house was a two-story frame house, with brick foundations. No tenants were living in it. That fact rendered the theft so easy. It is so with those who are carried away by sin. The easy victims are they whose lives are unoccupied, who are idle and listless.

By much slothfulness the building decayeth; and through idleness of the hands the house droppeth through (Eccles. 10: 18).

THE PRINCIPAL STREET IN THE CITY OF PANAMA

A Hidden Record

A dispute as to the ownership of certain valuable mining properties in Mariposa county, Calif., has been settled by a remarkable discovery. The property in dispute had been sold by one of the early settlers to a company, which had found upon it a rich ledge. The discovery was the subject of public comment, and the owners of the adjoining section declared that the ledge was on their land, and the settler had sold land which did not belong to him. Surveyors on both sides gave evidence and maps and public records were produced, but the court was undecided. The first government map of the county contained a reference to a blazed tree, which marked the dividing line between the two properties. Search was made for such a tree, but it could not be found. The court ordered another and closer inspection. Still no blazed tree could be found. Eventually, however, it was noticed that on a large oak there was a scar about six feet from the ground. Above and below the scar a deep cut was made and a slab pried off. The record was then clearly disclosed. The marking had been done with an axe in deeply cut letters and figures, but as the seasons passed, the bark had grown over the inscription, and new bark had filled in the marks, so that when the bark was removed it presented on its inner surface as exact an impression of the inscription as was given on a seal. The marks had been completely healed, but they remained on the tree and nothing the claim. Men sometimes forget that such an indelible record is made on them by their sin. Though it is covered over by a subsequent respectable life, it will yet appear against them if it has not been removed by the power of God.

If I sin, then thou markest me (Job 10: 14).

Reunion After Forty Years

A strange reunion took place recently in the Sawtelle Soldiers' Home in California. There are nearly four thousand veterans in the institution, and, of course, many are comparative strangers to others. Among them were two men, aged respectively sixty and seventy years. It appeared that although one had been in the Home nine years, and the other three, they had seldom been in one another's company, though they had met casually and passed as strangers. It happened early last month that one of the men heard the other addressed by his surname as he passed a group of veterans who were talking, and as the name was his own, he stayed to listen to his reply. There was something familiar in the tone and accent of the man's speech, so he accosted him and asked what part of the country he was from. The man told him, but said he had not been there since 1847. "Did you know any one of your name called Henry?" was the next question. "I had a little brother of that name," was the reply. "Well," said the other, "I am Henry." The two cordially shook hands and turned aside to have a brotherly talk, which was all the more interesting from the fact that though they had been so near together for three years, neither had suspected the fact. It would have made both lives happier had they recognized one another earlier. How many Christians there are who similarly miss the joys of companionship. They would be helped and strengthened if they recognized those near to them, who are brothers in Christ.

He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is no occasion of stumbling in him (1 John 2: 10).

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "In His Steps,"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. It is a really local experience, with the names only slightly veiled, and the facts easily recognizable. The great audience sits spellbound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told. Over three thousand persons sign the pledge, as the result of the story. An explosion wrecks the Beacon office and press, and injures George. Douglas pluckily continues publication, with the aid of friends.

"I BELIEVE George is shamming about that fracture and is staying on at the Edwards' just for the free board," said Douglas, mischievously. "He is getting fat. The only fracture that he has, I believe, is the one connected with his stomach. That has a crack in it that an extra edition of pie couldn't fill."

George looked unusually disturbed and did not venture to reply. Mr. Edwards hastily came to his rescue.

"Don't let them guy you, George. As long as I have a crust of pie left you shall share with me."

"Yes, indeed," Mrs. Edwards added, patting George on the head, affectionately. "It has done me good to see you eat. Mr. Edwards has had hard work to keep up with you."

Everybody laughed, and George muttered something about the office needing his attention now, and the papers began to come off the rack, and he was lost in admiration of the machine. The next day he insisted in coming down and sat around helping with the mail, and whatever else he could do that did not require walking or standing, holding high carnival of conversation with Quits over the marvelous good fortune of the Beacon, and predicting the election of Douglas to the position of State Printer by the next Legislature, to say nothing of future political and journalistic honors.

"Mr. Douglas may be Governor of the State some time," Quits ventured, in his slow, grave fashion.

"Governor!" George said with some contempt. "What is the use of being Governor when you can make governors? And that's what the press does. It makes governors and presidents. If it wasn't for the press, governors and presidents couldn't be elected. There wouldn't be any one to tell the common people who to vote for. They wouldn't know any more than so many cattle who to vote for if papers like the Beacon didn't give them directions."

"And papers like the Sentinel," said Quits, slyly.

"Huh! Who pays any attention to the editorials of the Sentinel? Do you suppose if their office got blown up the saloon men would put up contributions to buy it a new press? The Sentinel ain't in it with the Beacon."

"Bartlett has the county printing," said Quits, just to make George talk.

"He has now. But wait till the Beacon gets 5,000 subscribers. Then we'll show him. If we could only get blown up again in a year or two, it would probably double our subscription list. We've almost twice as many as we used to have."

"I don't think Mr. Douglas would care to increase his list by that process though, I should think you had had enough of getting blown up."

"I don't care for myself much, especially if I could get another go at Mrs. Edwards' pie," said George, as he hobbled over to the press and stood looking at it with admiring regard. "But I'd hate to have anything happen to this beauty."

With its new launching on the ocean of popularity, and the unexpected financial support, Douglas, during the months that followed, almost trembling at the success of the Beacon, lived in an atmosphere charged with high resolves and keen ambitions. He was obliged to add two more hands to the office force to assist Quits. George, at first, regarded the new-comers with distrust, but finding in a few days, that they were quiet, unassuming printers, he gradually received them into the circle and began to talk about the pressing need of typesetting machines to meet the growing demands of the Beacon's business. Douglas put a great deal of hard work into his editorial page, and viewed with pardonable satisfaction his surely growing subscription list, which now numbered over forty-seven hundred. It pleased him also to find in the exchanges out over the State, more and more complimentary comment on the Beacon, and quite frequent quotations from its editorials.

"'FRANK WANTS TO BEGIN HOUSEKEEPING,' ESTHER SAID"

But even the inspiration attending all this success paled into common things before the event in June, when Esthe and Douglas were married. As the da drew near, there was a noticeable excite ment in the air of the Beacon office an at the Edwards', where the ceremony wa to take place.

"Father is willing to come over here He and aunt have moved into anothe house since mother's death, so it woul not seem like home to me there," Esthe had said.

"We are delighted," Mrs. Edwards had replied. "But Mr. Edwards and I can hardly forgive you and Frank for no rooming with us for a while."

"Frank wants to begin housekeeping," Esther said, referring to an arrangemen Douglas had made to rent a cottage about two blocks from the office.

"That's all right," Mr. Edwards com mented heartily. "Anything but a board ing-house or a hotel for young married people. I'd rather open a can of beans and eat 'em cold out of the can, sitting on the edge of the kitchen sink in my own little home, than sit down to a table d'hote dinner in the best boarding-house on earth. You show sense in beginning the way you do. That is what your mother did, and that's what Mrs. Edwards and I did. Remember, Julia, that first pie you baked after we were married?" Mrs. Edwards gave him a warning look, but he pretended not to see it. "The juice ran out and glued the pie-pan to the bottom of the stove oven and I had to cut it loose with a hatchet."

"Why, James Edwards! It was not a hatchet."

"It was a carving-knife or the poker, then. But when we got it loose from the oven we couldn't get it out of the pan, and we had to eat it with a spoon, all except the bottom crust, which was burned on to the pan like a porcelain glaze."

"Why, James Edwards! It was no such thing!" Mrs. Edwards said with some feeling, but the look that her husband gave her was so comical that she burst out laughing, and Esther and Douglas joined her merrily, for their hearts were jubilant over the future, and their honest faith in each other was, as Mrs. Edwards said, one of the finest things she had ever witnessed.

A few days before the wedding, George came to Douglas; and with more embarrassment than the editor of the Beacon had ever known him to exhibit, he said:

"Mr. Douglas, who—who—are you going to have write it up?"

"Write what up?"

"Why, your— your wedding."

"Write it up! Nobody, I hope!" Douglas replied almost angrily.

"I— I— didn't mean any offense, Mr. Douglas," George went on doggedly, and with such a solemn look that George softened all at once. "Only I thought,— I wondered, if you—if you would be willing to have me write up something for the Clinton Mail. Their correspondent here in Colby is a chump and don't know a demi-train from a point lace chiffon. I could give them the real facts. Besides, their correspondent—you know him, Clem Burroughs—parts his hair in the centre and uses cologne and works in a drug store; he won't be present, will he?"

"I should think not," replied Douglas, indignantly. "There will be no one present except the Edwards', the Vernons', Esther's father and aunt, and Quits and you."

"And yourself, I suppose," said George, soberly.

"Why, yes, I hope to be there."

"And Miss Harris will be present I suppose?"

"I suppose she will. But I did not know you wrote for publication, George."

"But I do," said George, flushing.

The Boy and the Latch-key

AT a certain stage in his progress the boy feels very sure that he is a man, and resents anything like surveillance, or the enforcement of a too strenuous authority. He chafes at too tight a rein, thinks himself the arbiter of his own actions, likes to spend his evenings where and as he chooses, and perhaps asks for a latch-key. "There is no use in my keeping anybody sitting up for me till midnight," he says grandly, and is frequently rather aggrieved when told that father or mother will always sit up until he comes in. Midnight, except when there is a special occasion to detain a young man, is too late an hour for him to linger with thoughtless comrades away from home. At a much earlier time he should be in his own room. If the lad goes to business, he needs sleep as well as recreation, and if still a student, his books should furnish him with congenial occupation. Temptation traps the heedless feet of the boy who is under no restraint, and who may spend his evenings as he will, his inexperience leading him into perils that, later, he will be sorry that he did not avoid.

We do everything in our power to keep our daughters safe and pure, to guard their innocence from stain, and to surround them with absolute protection of one kind or another from the evils that lurk in ambush in this world. Our sons should be as precious, and as lovingly and carefully guarded as their sisters. Nothing is finer than that a man should reach maturity spotless in character, with no past follies to regret, and with no lapses from chaste living to bring a blush to his cheek. Far better is it that parents should be lovingly vigilant than thoughtlessly indulgent, and that the freedom of the latch-key should be withheld till the manhood has come and the boyhood is over.

A boy should be contented to spend many evenings at home. A parent who is judicious will see that home is inviting, and, above all, the father will be companionable with his sons. Good men are sometimes so grumpy, so unreasonable, and so faultfinding in their behavior that they drive their sons out of the home; they not only forget that once they were boys, but they so conduct themselves that one fancies they must have been very disagreeable boys. A boy should be allowed to enjoy his friends' company in his own house, and his own room, and if he have a fad of any kind, a camera for example, or if he like wood-carving, let him carry out his own fancies undisturbed. Then he will not miss a latch-key.

Character Building

"If only I had his chance," said one boy to another, as they stood watching one about their own age board an outgoing train on his way to college. "Our chances were the same in the beginning, but he has left us to bring up the rear. I should like to know the secret of it all."

"And I can tell you," remarked a gentleman, who had been an unobserved listener to the entire conversation. "While you have been content to drift along, satisfied with a half measure of success, this friend of yours, whom you are disposed to envy, has been engaged in building up a character, strong, noble and beautiful, worthy of intelligent beings bearing the image of God."

"Indeed," continued the gentleman, "I have closely watched this same boy for a number of years, and have found with the keenest pleasure, that in building character he used the Bible as the great stay and guide of his life. Neither was he satisfied to stay forever in the primer of religious knowledge, as a late conversation with him led me to discover that he had thought deeply upon many spiritual truths. But there are still many glorious things beyond him, and these, I believe, he has gone on to learn."

As the gentlemen left, the two boys turned thoughtfully away, and their eyes met with a questioning look. "He spoke the truth every time," said one. "You could never persuade Russell to do a mean or cowardly act, and I have known him cheerfully to deny himself for the cause of truth and right. You remember at school, no bantering of the fellows would ever induce him to change his course of right living."

"You remember when Tom Lewis told him he was pinned to his mother's apron-string, he replied he hoped he might always remain there."

Then they separated, and went to their homes with more food for thought than had lately occupied them. They had thought themselves particularly manly in those days at school when they had sometimes engaged in questionable sports, but here was this fellow-student, whom they had sneered at, who had used the Bible in character building, and who now towered head and shoulders above them.

And the fruit of the pondering was, that the only true course in life is that of right living and right thinking.

S. V. Du Bois.

Self-Supporting College Students

Out great universities and our small colleges alike show great extremes in the worldly state of the students. At Harvard, Yale, Princeton and Columbia, there are many sons of very wealthy fathers, young men with large allowances, who are surrounded by luxuries during their academic course. To speak of these young men as dissipated or reckless, would be unfair. Many of them are new students and use their opportunities well. It is never the mere accident of poverty or riches that makes a noble man. These universities have always their quota of poor men who work their way, of men who fearlessly economize because the home people are making sacrifices to give them a liberal education. As an exposed situation toughens the tree, and makes it strike firmer into the stubborn soil, so a tussle with poverty toughens the man, and brings his finer, his more indomitable qualities into relief. The self-supporting students in our co-educational colleges, especially, are worthy of all praise, and they will be heard from in days to come.

TURKISH WOMEN TAKING THE AIR

They live secluded in the harem, these women of Turkey, and seldom are permitted to go forth in freedom. When they venture abroad, they are veiled. The lives of Moslem women are dull, stupid, and flavorless, filled with childish gossip and foolish chatter. In early middle life they put on flesh, and then grow old fast

The Golden Shore

One of our readers who has had a vision of the sweet home beyond, "where our loved ones are," has written a poem from which our space permits only an extract. The poem is a father's tribute to the memory of three precious daughters who have "gone before" to the blessed place prepared for Christ's ransomed ones. Mr. N. S. Doty, of Kansas City, Mo., is the author:

They walked upon the golden streets
Where many a saint doth tread;
They saw the crystal fountain
And the resurrected dead.

In that city where the mansions
Are not built by human hand,
Where the architect is Christ himself
There in the Promised Land,
Where the atmosphere is pure delight
And storms are quite unknown,
Where evermore are hosts redeemed
Ministering 'round the Throne.

The Young People

IN our homes as well as in our church life and work the young people are very important. Not only because they are the hopes and promise of to-morrow, but apparent whose character and tendencies are matters to be anxiously ascertained, but because at the present time make or mar the many happiness and usefulness of our homes. A pastor who neglects young and eager to interest the young people is in the wrong field, as it is not adapted to twentieth century demands. A Sunday School superintendent, who sees the young men and women leaving the school as soon as they pass the limited line where childhood melts into the larger life of dawning maturity, has certainly written plain and clear upon his notebook. A homestead from which the young people fly, because it is dull and unattractive, nagged at, classed deprived of rights and privileges that belong to them, is an abortion and prison like place and is not, in the best sense of the word, a home.

Young people bring the enthusiasm and cheer of their abounding vitality into the arena, and if they are sometimes reckless, and at times boisterous, we must remember that this is natural at an age when movement is easy, and when the blood is hot and bright. How many of us would at an age when movement is easy, and when the blood is hot and bright, have managed to perform the magnificent feat which Richard Hakluyt mentions in his book, and carried through the administration of Admiral Cervera and the Spanish fleet, with orders from our government in the hands of their own officers! The man who followed Pizarro up the steps of San Juan accomplished a feat that could be done only by youth. The tremendous conflict of the Civil War was fought by young men, the flower of the land, North and South. Wherever we may hope to gain in refinement and Christian progress, we shall gain through consecrated youth, and its conquering ardor.

In our homes, our young people have the right to considerations. They should not be treated like little children, nor kept in subjection and restraint after they have reached an age of responsibility. In some parents the children never grow up, and they surround young men and women with fetters of parental authority which should long since been and loved with the ground.

The Cigarette Habit

I do not think mothers fight as they should the cigarette habit in growing boys. It is a bad habit in children and sooner is often ill, when it occasions to take much interest in study, and strikes the daily tasks the pupil's lazy is that he is being poisoned by nicotine. Boys fancy smoking to be a manly accomplishment, and they dread being laughed at by their companions if they do not smoke. The little package in many a boy's pocket is the token of his first step toward a confirmed and enervating appetite, of very doubtful advantages to any one, and, to sane persons, a decidedly abhorrent habit.

Patching and Mending

Such a beautiful table cloth as my friend Sally D. had on the supper board, when they were expecting the minister and his wife.

"Why, Sally," I said, "one does not often touch napery like this. It is as fine as silk."

"It's growing thin," sighed Sally, "and it's been darned so often that I'm afraid it won't last much longer."

Then she showed me the most pretty of needle and Darning by the thread darning so exquisite that it surpassed embroidery.

"We can't afford new things often," said Sally, "for we never have any money to spare, but we have good, and what we have. I know how to darn and patch, and I shall teach the children the same arts. I shall [illegible] beautifully."

Peggy, aged eleven, blushed. She was a busy, handy child, practical already in many and various ways of helping her mother.

Some years ago, an old lady was [illegible] possible in domestic arts, passed out of the line. She had a way of composed mien though, and what she had left to her friends in the quiet God's Acre, [illegible] with sorrow and regret.

"Aunt Lucy always helped us about the mending," [illegible] Lucy could twist and turn, and make old things look as good as new." It was an accomplishment to possess in a young woman.

"KNOW THOU THE GOD OF THY FATHER" ❋ David's Charge to Solomon

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 29
I. CHRONICLES 28: 1-10

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--PROV. 3: 5:
"TRUST IN THE LORD WITH ALL THINE HEART"

A WONDERFUL scene is being enacted in Jerusalem; an aged king is abdicating in favor of his young son. King David is seventy years old, and is older than his years, because of the hardships and anxieties of his early manhood. His son Solomon is eighteen. A vast multitude is assembled to witness the ceremony. All the princes in Israel, the priests also, and Levites and warriors, and thousands of the people. King David has come to the function from what was thought to be his dying-bed. The chill of death had crept over him, so that he could not be made warm by extra bedclothes piled upon him. But here he is before the people with so much strength that he is able to stand on his feet. Strength has come to him because a great exigency is upon him. We cannot doubt that he is strengthened of God, that his will may be done in the coronation of Solomon. There is need for quick and decisive action, for another son of King David, Adonijah, knowing of his father's near approach to death, has had himself proclaimed king, and even now he is holding a coronation feast almost in sound of King David's voice. At last, the voices of those who rejoice at King Solomon's elevation, reach Adonijah and those who are seated at his table, and cause great consternation. The guests suddenly cease eating and disperse. Adonijah flees to the altar of sacrifice, and takes hold upon its horns that he may claim mercy at the hands of King Solomon. King Solomon heeds his appeal and condones his offense, and promises that not a hair of his head shall fall to the ground, "if he will show himself a worthy man."

When Solomon appears with King David before the Assembly, he had already been anointed king. He has ridden upon the state mule through the streets of Jerusalem as a public declaration that he is the successor of King David. The huzzas of the people at that time were what had alarmed Adonijah and his guests.

The Assembly has met to ratify the selection of Solomon as their king. King David first delivers his charge to the people, telling them how God had named Solomon as his successor and the temple-builder, when it had been in his heart to build "a house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the Lord." And King David calls upon the people to "keep and seek all the commandments of the Lord," that they may hold the land that God has given them.

Then King David delivers his charge to Solomon, and urges him to serve God "with a perfect heart and a willing mind," and warns him that if he should forsake God, he will be cast off forever. Next follows the apportionment of gold and silver, which King David has gathered for the building of the temple, from the National Treasury, from his own fortune, and from the gifts of the princes and people. It was an immense sum, which would be large in our day and enormous in that early time. All calculations of the total based on the present value of gold are necessarily dubious.

King David gives out this treasure by weight, so much for the candlesticks of gold and for the lamps of gold, and so much gold for the tables of shew bread, and for the bowls, and cups and basins, just so much for each class of articles. And with the silver he does likewise. What an amount of energy was thus put forth by a man with one foot already in the grave! It is to be compared with the stirring up of embers, which thereby flash out a bright light. The enthusiasm is so great, that the people take off their rings with settings of precious stones, and gold chains studded with gems, and cast them down before King David, for the house of the Lord. King David, in a prayer of consecration, gives these things to God as offerings from willing hearts.

Now King David delivers to his son Solomon the pattern of the house that is to be built for the Lord, "the pattern that he had by the Spirit" (I. Chron. 28: 12), and charges him to build it, and also to build a temple of character in his own soul by serving God with a perfect heart.

King David calls upon the whole congregation to bow before God and their new king in token of loyalty. And they bow down.

Sacrifices of one thousand bullocks, one thousand lambs, and one thousand rams are offered to God. The people pray to have their sins forgiven in the sin offerings, consecrate themselves to God's service in the burnt offerings, and proclaim their friendship in the peace offerings. (Only a small part, the fat of the inwards, was really burned. The other parts were used as food for the priests and the people.)

King Solomon is a second time anointed king, this time in the presence of the Assembly. "Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father, and prospered; and all Israel obeyed him" (I. Chron. 29: 23).

Illustration and Application

Here in one lesson we have a lesson for the old on a Christian ending of life, and for the young on a Christian beginning. It is David's "Recessional," in which he appeals, like Kipling, amid the "pomp of power" to the best religious sentiments of his son and his people "lest they forget."

THE TRADITIONAL TOMB OF DAVID

He hath chosen. Here we have one of many illustrations that while man proposes, God disposes. David generously planned to build God a house as beautiful as his own. To spend more of our money in self-indulgence than in honoring God by doing good to men is a public denial of our Christian profession. David's motive was commendable. But God wished to put a check on war, and so bade David leave the temple building to a prince of peace, who should succeed him and stand as the antitype of the Peace-bringer that was to come. All through the story, like a chorus, come the words, "God hath chosen"—he hath chosen Judah, and out of Judah has "chosen me," but for the temple-builder has "chosen Solomon." God in history is here proclaimed, and it is a fitting truth for the anniversary season when the close relation of God to government is shown in Providential recollections. Thanksgiving is the annual hilltop, where Memory and Hope, like aged David and young Solomon, stand together, one looking back gratefully, the other forward trustfully.

"THEN DAVID GAVE TO SOLOMON THE PATTERN OF ALL THAT HE HAD BY THE SPIRIT"

Grave on thy heart each past "red letter" day!
Forget not all the sunshine of the way
By which the Lord hath led thee; answered prayers
And joys unasked, strange blessings, lifted cares.
Grand promise—echoes! Thus thy life shall be
One record of his love and faithfulness to thee.
—FRANCES HAVERGAL.

General Miles, retired from military service, looking back on war, expresses sentiments very fitting to go with the Divine condemnation of war in this lesson, and needed to check the dangerous militarism of our time all over the world. An interview he accorded to Mr. Creelman, in the New York World, is worthy to take its place with the most noteworthy pleas of other famous soldiers: "The spirit of peace should be cultivated. We are not a meddlesome, warring nation. When war comes, the war spirit will respond, and the brave, patriotic American soldiers will make it effective. But the spirit of peace should be cultivated rather than the demon of carnage. There is no necessity to stir the passions of Americans in order to be sure that they will be patriotic. They love and appreciate their liberties and will maintain and defend them against all enemies."

What David said of God's rejection of his proposal to build the temple, being rejected by God because of his war was in the nature of a confession that his course in war h not always been wholly right. Frederick the Great was sa to have proved his greatness by saying frankly, instead blaming others, "I made a mistake." And here is a lik proof of Wellington's greatness. The Duke had rung h bell. No answer. A second ring; still no answer. A thir ditto. At length, after immense delay, the footman, quite his leisure, happened to appear. Wellington fired a perfe volley of indignant words. "Please, your Grace," stuttere the poor fellow, "the bell is broken." "Broken, is it? O I was not aware of that. I am really very sorry, William. beg your pardon." A little girl was present. She had ev dently been an eager little listener. "My dear," said th Duke beautifully—the Iron Duke loved children—"lear something, whenever you are in the wrong, own it!"

We read to-day of the King of Israel, whom the Proph Micaiah had frequently reproved, because God saw he ha been in the wrong; yet Ahab would on no consideration ow it. How differently Ahab acted from David! (II. Sam. 12 13). When we find people frankly owning faults, it is th sure sign of intellectual and moral greatness—nay, of spiritu greatness, by God's grace being at work in the heart. I short, as somebody has so well written: "It is the test qualit in Christian life, the invariable token of true nobility." Nex time, therefore, you discover you are in the wrong, remembe the hero of Waterloo begging his footman's pardon! Ther like the great Duke of Wellington, own it!

As we see aged David at death's door, we recall Hogarth picture of death. A few months before that ingenious artis Hogarth, was seized with the malady which deprived societ of one of its most distinguished ornaments, he proposed t his matchless pencil the work he has entitled the "Tailpiece. The first idea of this is said to have been started in compan at his own table. "My next undertaking," said Hogarth "shall be the end of all things. "If that is the case," replied on of his friends, "your busines will be finished; for there wi be an end to the painter. "That will be so," answere Hogarth, sighing heavily, "and therefore, the sooner my worl is done the better." According ly he began the next day, an continued his design with a dili gence that seemed to indicat an apprehension (as the repor goes) he should not live till h had completed it. This, how ever, he did in the most inge nious manner, by grouping everything which could denot the end of all things: a broke bottle; an old broom worn t the stump; the butt end of a old firelock; a cracked bell; a bow unstrung; a crown tumble in pieces; towers in ruins; th sign-post of a tavern, called th World's End, tumbling; th moon in her wane; the map o the globe burning; a gibbe falling, the body gone, and th chains which held it dropping down; Phœbus and his horses dead in the clouds; a vesse wrecked; Time, with his hour glass and scythe broken, a tobacco pipe in his mouth, th last whiff of smoke going out a play-book opened, with exeunt omnes stamped in th corner; an empty purse; and a statute of bankruptcy taken out against nature. "So far good," cried Hogarth; "nothing remains but this," taking his pencil in a sort of prophetic fury, and dashing off the similitude of a painter's palette broken —"Finis!" exclaimed Hogarth; "the deed is done, all is over." It is a very remarkable and well-known fact that he never again took the palette in hand. It is a circumstance less known, perhaps, that he died about a year after he had finished this extraordinary "Tailpiece."

Bright ride of death. David's trust in God at death's door recalls Dr. John G. Paton's story of the old cannibal chief, who said as he lay dying: "My soul is growing tall with joy." Perronet, author of "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," at the door of death, exclaimed, "Glory be to God in the height of his divinity; glory be to God in the depth of his humanity; glory be to God in his all-sufficiency, and into his hands I commit my spirit."

Let us review another life such as many a young man covets, and see how it looks from the death end. In Terre Haute, on one of the handsome streets, a palatial residence used to be pointed out as the home of Sam McDonald, or "Champagne Charley." The situation and beautiful natural surroundings had been made charming by the prodigal expenditure of money. The inscriptions on the globes of the gas lamps were "Welcome Rowdies," "Loafers' Retreat," and many such, which were sensational in the extreme. On a birthday he gave a party to a thousand of his friends; he had wine mains put in, so that he could have a hydrant for wine on every tree of his yard. He wasted in prodigality within less than five years, between two and three million of dollars. He finally killed a man, and his fortune was ruined to clear him. He soon died, and died poor.

BRINGING CHRIST INTO THE WORKSHOP

PORT HU'RON, Michigan, is a city of twenty thousand population, situated at the foot of the beautiful Lake Huron, on the St Clair River. Like many of the Michigan cities, its principal industry is manufacturing. Railway car and locomotive repair and erecting shops, ship yards, flour mill machinery, threshing machines, traction engines, saws, screws and bolts, injectors, malleable iron castings, wood fibre products, etc., are numbered among the industries, in all employing near five thousand men.

The population is cosmopolitan, being made up of Germans, French, Assyrians, Italians, Canadians, etc. The central churches are large and well-furnished, but, as in all other American communities, the absence of workingmen in the congregations is very noticeable.

Recently, Mr. J. E. Coulter, General Secretary of the Railway Young Men's Christian Association, made a careful study of the situation, and decided to introduce Gospel meetings in the various shops throughout the city. Associating with himself Rev. W. H. Sargent, who has had an evangelistic training and is eminently fitted for this kind of service, work was begun in the car and locomotive shops. Up to this time, over thirty meetings have been held, with an average attendance of over one hundred.

REV. W. H. SARGENT

At first the men seemed backward, and were not inclined to take much interest, always keeping within long range of the speaker. At times the company's watchman or policeman would have to quiet the men, so that the meeting could proceed. But a wonderful change has taken place (as shown by the picture on the first page), and now the men crowd as close to the organ as possible. At this particular meeting, the Rev. D. N. Mc Cammus, pastor of the Central Methodist Church, Sarnia, Ontario, was the speaker. A number of meetings have been held, which were equally as large.

In the car shops, the men have, of their own accord, organized a male quartet and chorus, to help in the meetings. They also make suggestions as to singers and speakers whom they would like to hear. Mr. John Hodgson, Master Car-Builder of these shops, frequently attends the meetings and assists in the services. He heartily endorses the movement, and in a letter to Mr. Coulter, he says, "I consider that the noon meetings are one of the best things that have taken place in our factory; and while I have not heard of any conversions thus far, I do know that the men have been brought closer together, and that there is a feeling throughout the shops that these meetings are beneficial. Nearly every man in the factory appreciates what has been done, and feels there is a sacredness about the place. Again, you may walk through our factory a dozen times and never hear an oath. Further, these meetings keep the men from spending their noon time talking about prize fights, horse-races, boxing contests, etc., and put their minds on better things. Since we started the male chorus, you would be surprised to know how many men have made application to join. The meetings are also making our employees more faithful and loyal to the company."

Encouraged by past results, plans have been made to hold eighty-four regular and a few special meetings this fall and winter. The meetings are under the supervision of the Railway Young Men's Christian Association, and the Secretary and his helper are also assisted by the various pastors of the city, who give their services gladly, as it brings them in touch with the workingmen. Denominational work would be impractical in any of the large shops or factories; but there is no objection to the Association taking up the work, as it is interdenominational, and each church is represented.

The work is not to be confined to religious effort, but will include lectures and practical talks on practical subjects. Since introducing this work in the car and locomotive shops, others have requested that the work be extended to them also.

The need of this kind of work is felt in almost every community. It is not the intention of the writer of this article to exalt Port Huron, but rather to stimulate other communities to join in the movement.

The Suffering in Macedonia

American Board Missionaries Appeal to "The Christian Herald" in Behalf of the Homeless Refugees

THE following cablegram from the American missionaries at Monastir, Macedonia, has been received:

"MONASTIR, Turkey, Nov. 5.

"Dr. Louis Klopsch, 'Christian Herald,' N. Y.:

"The missionaries of the American Board in Macedonia, beg you to appeal to your many thousand benevolent subscribers, to send speedy succor to the many thousand wretched sufferers in the Monastir vilayet.

"The 'Cry from Macedonia' is from ragged, roofless, hungry, wounded, sick men, women and children, utterly helpless and hopeless almost, except as they look westward to Christian England and America.

"The relief agency at Monastir, of which I am Treasurer, has received thus far from London £2,920. At a moderate estimate, we need at this central depot $1,000 a day, simply to keep people alive till spring. The distress is appalling. Rev. Mr. Haskell says of some specimen refugees at Ochrida that 'they seem to be pretty much everything but hung drawn and quartered.'

"Winter is anticipated with horrible forebodings. Immediate relief would be a godsend. Let England and America unite in this blessed work. We will gratefully act as your distributing agents if you so desire.

(Signed) "LEWIS BOND."

Dr. Bond is one of the missionaries of the American Board, and in appealing in behalf of the suffering Christians of Macedonia, he does so with a full personal knowledge of the conditions of the case. It would appear from the cablegram, that the difficulties in the way of relief have been removed. Dr. Bond, who has been many years in the Macedonian field as missionary, and who is possessed of ripe experience, has evidently awaited such an opportunity, deferring his appeal until the way was open for practical work, unhindered by the military operations of either the Turks or the insurrectionists. All contributions sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the Macedonian relief work will be forwarded to Dr. Bond, to be applied by the American missionaries at Monastir in aid of the sufferers.

"Force-thoughts"

BY SUNNY JIM

YOUR grocer pays more for "FORCE" than for the imitations—because quality and purity cost more.

¶ No wonder that he pushes other brands, if he is one of the sort that thinks more of to-day's penny than of to-morrow's dollar.

¶ This food of mine is for sale everywhere now, and there's no reason to go without it unless you are willing to try the Imitations.

¶ They can choose names that sound like "FORCE"—and make foods that look like "FORCE," but they're not "FORCE" by a long way. The fact that wheat and malt enter into their composition doesn't make them like "FORCE" any more than the stone and lumber in your house make it the same as the house across the way.

¶ "FORCE" forms the morning meal of two million clear-eyed, quick-nerved people—the members of "The 'FORCE' Society."

Their day's work is easier than other folks'.

They do not Hurry
Nor worry!
They say to the rest of the world each morning:
"Be Sunny!"

¶ If you think there's any other sort of food that is just as good for you buy a package to-day, and begin to-morrow with a "FORCE" breakfast.

In the meantime you'd like a copy of my new book—I think

Yours truly,

Sunny Jim

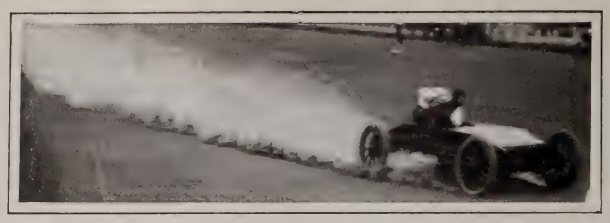
AN AUTO AT EXPRESS SPEED



Our photograph shows how an automobile appears when traveling at the rate of sixty miles per hour. The picture was taken lately at Columbus, O., when the car traveled a measured mile in 59 4-5 seconds. This rate of speed—over sixty miles an hour—was maintained for a distance of ten miles. The motor had an engine of forty horse-power. It passed the group of spectators like a flash, raising in its wake a long trailing cloud of dust, which obscured the roadway and filled the nostrils of those who stood near. This is the highest rate of locomotion ever attained by any machine other than a locomotive. A collision between a heavy auto traveling so swiftly, and any other machine or object of considerable weight, would have a frightful result. It is doubtful whether any one could, on either side, survive the shock of such a collision.

Christianity in India*

A General Survey of the Conditions of the Huge Field of Labor

HOW impossible it is in one evening to take a general view of India, may be realized when we remember that its area is half that of the United States, or as large as the whole of Europe, exclusive of Russia, and that its population is four times that of this country. Its races, too, as well as its languages, are as diverse as those of Europe. Only in subordination to the British crown, and the preponderating profession of Brahmanism or Hinduism is the union. Mohammedanism exists still as a relic of the old conquerors of the country, and Buddhism survives in some sections, but Hinduism is practically the religion of the whole country. This is not the Hinduism proclaimed here by the various "Swamis," who have come to us as missionaries, preaching a refined and expurgated system, but Hinduism in naked, revolting vice, a religion which makes immorality a rite, and encourages and promotes the degradation of its priests and followers.

It is a stupendous undertaking to attempt to convert India to Christ, and none realize it more keenly than the devoted men and women who have given their lives to the work. Of these, counting all denominations, there are now about three thousand, or one to every one hundred thousand of the people. Though little more than a century has elapsed since the first Christian missionaries landed in India, there were 1,148,259 persons, who, in the census of 1901, had the courage to register themselves as Protestant Christians. This, in spite of the fact, that such an avowal involved the enmity of relatives, and, frequently, disinheritance. Besides these, there are a large number who cannot be counted, who are Christians at heart, but cannot bear to break with their families. They say: "We shall remain Hindus, but our children will be Christian." They study the Bible, they love and reverence Christ, and are Christian in all but the name. The increase in the number of Christians during the past six years, has been much more rapid than in any previous period. The Christian benevolence in the two grievous famines of 1897 and 1900 has had much to do with this, for it removed prejudice previously existing. When the 5,500 orphans, now being educated at the expense of American Christians, under the auspices of this journal, go forth, leading Christian lives, among their people, a still more rapid increase may be expected.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. M. S. L., Indianapolis, Ind. "I want to thank you for printing the answered prayers. I had a great sorrow over one of my dear children. I went to a secret place and told all my troubles to the Lord. The answer came. Now I am taking all my joys and sorrows to the Lord, and he helps me every time."

Reader, Holton, Kan. "I have hesitated long about acknowledging publicly the many answers I receive to prayer, but now I wish to be one amongst the many to say that the Lord has answered my prayers many times. There are still blessings that I desire, but I have assurance that they will come in his own time and way."

Reader. "I wish to acknowledge the loving kindness of our Father in answering my prayers."

Reader, Chicago, Ill. "God has many times answered my petitions. I praise Him for his faithfulness, and find it sweet to rest in his Word."

Mrs. S. E. G., St. Joseph, Mo. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayer for two beloved brothers, who had acquired the drink habit. They are now sober, good citizens."

R., Zanesville, O. "I was in great distress. I prayed that the trouble, which would have been very disastrous to me, might be averted, and the answer came."

Mrs. J. S., Fort Tremont, S. C. "I have always been a firm believer in prayer. I believe my prayers are always heard, and take everything to God in prayer. I think the best thing one person can do for another in this world is to pray for him."

C. H., Toledo, O. "I promised the Lord if he would answer the one petition I was holding before him, I would publicly acknowledge it. The answer came sooner than I expected."

A. M. H., Clarington, O. "I have several times had my prayers in behalf of loved ones answered. A great affliction came to one dear to me. I said if the Lord would help I would tell it to the world. Praise his name, he did help."

L. T., Gray Horse, O. T. "What a comfort to know there is one to whom we can go with all our troubles. I know that God hears and answers all our prayers, for he so many times has answered mine."

Mrs. L. A. D., Olive Branch, Miss. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers when I was greatly burdened and felt that only my Heavenly Father could help me. I find it such a comfort to carry everything to God in prayer."

Mrs. M. B. C., Triune, Tenn. "I have had many answers. I am a strong believer in a prayer-answering God."

Reader, Canton, Ill. "I have been greatly helped by reading the letters of the Answered Prayer column. God has wonderfully answered my prayers many times, and now, while passing under a dark cloud, I can still pray and feel the assurance that he will hear me still and lift the burden from my heart."

A. F. I., Newton, N. H. "I know God hears and answers prayer. If we believe, we have what we ask."

Sister, Michigan. "I have had my prayer answered. Once my brother was in deep trouble. I prayed to God to help him and he heard and answered. I am trusting him and giving him all the praises."

L. L. S., Ellensburg, Wis. "The Lord has answered one of my prayers, for which I praise his name, and I hope and trust that many more may be answered. Where I live it is hard for one to keep in the path of duty; but by the help of God I will press onward."

Reader, Manchester, N. H. "I thank the Lord for answering what has been the great desire of my heart for years. I have had many blessings in answer to prayer."

M. F., Fairfax, Vt. "I have been an invalid for thirty years, and have found much comfort in prayer."

Reader, Belton, S. C. "I made a solemn promise before God that if my prayer was answered I would confess it publicly. My prayer was answered. I give God the glory."

Thankful One. "In great sorrow, I took my troubles to the Lord in Christ's name, and pleading the promise. The cloud lifted, and I knew that he is faithful that promised. This has many times been my experience. To him be all the glory."

Amy, Goldendale, Wash. "I wish to acknowledge my Heavenly Father's care for me, and the many times He has answered my prayers, not always in the way I had expected, but his was the better way."

DATE MUFFINS
For BREAKFAST

CORN STARCH TALK

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

The breakfast which suits the average person need not be a hearty meal, but certain elements must be furnished to satisfy the appetite and prepare us for the day's labor. Heavy meats are neither required nor as a rule relished, but starch in some form must be used to give us energy and force. Many of the cereals in the market fail to do this, partly from their inferior properties and partly from insufficient cooking. Unless a cereal be very thoroughly cooked it is worse than none and we might better procure our starch in a more digestible form.

Nine people out of ten would prefer a crisp and delicate muffin to any prepared food.

A muffin made with Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch will be light and tender, with a fine crust and soft center. For sake of variety fruit may be added to the batter and the receipt given here will furnish muffins enjoyed alike by young and old.

DATE MUFFINS

Add two well beaten yolks of eggs to two rounding tablespoons of butter creamed with two of sugar. Sift one cup of flour and half a cup of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch with two teaspoons of baking powder and a little salt. Add this alternately with a scant cup of milk, beat well and stir in three quarters of a cup of dates cut into small pieces. Mix in gently the stiff whites of two eggs and bake in a moderately hot oven.

ASTRONOMERS ON THE SUN-SPOTS

MANY theories have been advanced to account for the presence of the remarkable sun-spots which are a centre of attraction to the astronomical world at the present time One of the most surprising of these theories is that suggested by a reader of this paper, in Cortland, N. Y., who, in a recent letter, ventured the assertion that "the spots on the sun's disc are new worlds, and that they are composed of something that is indestructible by fire."

For the purpose of ascertaining, in behalf of its great circle of readers, the opinions of America's leading astronomers regarding the source and character of the phenomena now visible in the sun, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD addressed letters of inquiry to these men of science, and was favored with many interesting replies.

Prof. W. W. Campbell, director of the Lick Observatory, Mount Hamilton, Cal., writes:

"The sun-spots are the evidences of extra-rapid circulation within the sun's atmosphere."

Prof. Lewis Swift, F. R. A. S., writes from Marathon, N. Y.:

"The cause of sun-spots is another of the many mysteries in which astronomy deals so largely. Many more or less absurd theories have been advanced for their appearance once in about eleven and one-third years. The most reasonable, and the only one that can for a moment stand the test of long continued telescopic, spectroscopic and photographic observations is, that the sun is really a dark body surrounded with a self-luminous atmosphere, and that the spots are openings in it, revealing the dark sun rendered intensely black by contrast. They are sometimes of appalling magnitude. One of the present group was estimated to have been, when discovered, twelve times the entire surface of the earth, or more than 2,000,000,000 square miles, being the largest seen in recent times."

Professor Garrett P. Serviss, of New York, writes:

"The idea that the spots now visible on the disc of the sun are new worlds in process of creation is not entirely novel. The idea is, however, based on a complete misapprehension of the laws of physical science. Science finds certain laws of nature in operation, which it never sees violated, and these laws assure us that new worlds cannot be created in the sun and have their orbits enclosed within its body. If the sun could be blown to pieces, or if, through a rapid increase in its rotation, it could be disrupted by centrifugal force, new bodies might be formed from it. But neither of these things have happened, and from our present knowledge it is not conceivable that either of them will ever happen. It is not improbable that relatively small masses of matter are sometimes ejected from the sun with so great a velocity that they pass out into space, and, upon cooling and condensing, become meteors; but if such a body should plunge back into the sun it would be revaporized and destroyed.

"The present sun-spots do not differ in their nature and their general appearance from the sun-spots that astronomers have seen and studied since the days of Galileo. Exactly what causes them we do not know, but neither the telescope nor the spectroscope, when applied to them, gives the slightest countenance to the suggestion that they are new worlds or planets. On the contrary, they are plainly vast depressions in the solar surface, surrounded and overhung by masses and clouds of matter in the gaseous or vaporous state, and the nature of this matter is unmistakably revealed by the characteristic spectral lines to be seen in the light that emanates from it."

Prof. C. A. Young of the Princeton (N. J.) Observatory, Acting Chief H. F. Williams of the U. S. Weather Bureau, Washington, and F. W. Hodge, Assistant to Prof. Langly, of the Smithsonian Institute, all write to discredit the theory that the "sun-spots are new "worlds in creation."

Up to the present time the precise nature, as well as the cause of these sun-spots, remains a subject of uncertainty, even to the astronomers themselves.

"Little Mother" of the Prisoners*

Mrs. Maude Ballington Booth Tells of Her Prison Reform Experiences

I FRANKLY confess we have had disappointments, (in our prison work), and over them bitter tears have been shed and painful heartaches endured. Some men have proved unworthy, but they have been the exceptions to the rule. Many thought we would have a majority that would prove unworthy, and but a small minority to remain faithful, but even had it been so, should we have a right to say that the work was not worth while? We have, however, to record that the many have proved worthy and faithful, and only the few have failed us. It is always a lamented fact that it is just the few who do go wrong, who arrive at public notice, while the multitude who do well are never heard of through the public press, but are hidden away in the quiet, commonplace, workaday world of those who tread the straight path of honesty. I can unhesitatingly say that the results have already shown such a return in homes made happy, lives redeemed, and wrong-doers changed into good law-abiding citizens, that we, who have made the largest investment, feel a thousandfold repaid. In my journeys hither and thither all over the country, I am constantly seeing the far-reaching results of the work, which, coming at unexpected times and unlooked-for places, are all the more welcome.

I had boarded a "sleeper" at one of our large terminal depots, and was bestowing my baggage beneath the berth in an already-darkened car. A man in the uniform of the road hurried by me, swinging his lantern. After he had passed me, I looked up, and the light must have fallen on my face, for he stopped with an exclamation, and looking quickly to right and left to see if his words might be overheard, he turned to me, and stretching out his hand, said, "Little Mother, I can't miss the chance of speaking to you. You don't know me, but you will be glad to hear that I am doing well, and have been living right ever since I left the place where I met you last. I have been making a good record now for nearly two years, and all is well."

I had changed cars in a Western city on a somewhat gloomy day, and while I was rechecking my baggage, a freight train pulled into the depot. One of the crew sprang down, making his way to me with a smiling face and an outstretched hand. "Why, I thought it was you, Little Mother," he said, as he held my hand in his, blackened and hardened with toil. "I am so glad to see you again, for I have only good news to tell. I went straight home to my people when I left Joliet, and they can testify to the change in me, and now I am leading a happy, steady life, and have proved that it is possible to do so, despite the past. I have worked nearly two years on this road now, and, best of all, I am keeping my promise to God and proving faithful to what I learned as a League member."

Arriving at one of the big Chicago stations I stood undecided on the crowded sidewalk as to which direction I should take. A voice hailed me, and I looked up to see a cabman waving his whip enthusiastically at me. Thinking that after the manner of his tribe, he was seeking a fare, I paid no attention. Leaving his cab, he hastened to me to greet me with outstretched hand and smiling face. "Yes," said the officer at my side, "he is one of your boys, paroled from Joliet, and lately he has received his full discharge."

I had been speaking in a crowded audience in one of the large churches in the far West. At the close of my address quite a number of friends came forward to speak to me. A gentleman grasped my hand, and as I looked into the handsome, intelligent face, I had a faint recollection of having met him before, or was it only a resemblance to some one I had known? As he greeted me, I caught the gleam of the little silver pin worn by members of the Defenders' League, an organization of the friends of the Volunteers. I said most cordially how glad I always was to meet our Defenders, but his hand did not loosen its grasp, and he was searching my face for a more personal recognition. "So you don't know me," he said at last. "No," I said, "I must confess I do not. Where have I met you before?" "It was in Charlestown, Little Mother," came the answer with that thrill of loving gratitude that has so often warmed my heart in the voices of many of my "boys." Could it be? Yes, truly it was a young man who had gone from our League in that Eastern prison years before, and here he was, a prosperous, successful business man. "I have brought my mother with me," he said, and my hand was laid in that of a sweet-faced gentlewoman, in whose eyes a wealth of love and pride shone through the moisture of tears. That was not all, for he then told me he had been recently married, and brought forward a beautiful young girl, whom he presented to me with the pride of a true affection. She made the last of the happy trio who lived in the pretty little home in the outskirts of that city, where flowers and birds and almost perpetual sunshine make the shadows of prison bars seem very far away. Those prison days to him are now but the nightmare of the dead years which, through God's grace, will come no more.

MRS. MAUDE BALLINGTON BOOTH

Sometimes it is a motorman who smiles me a greeting as I board his car, or a waiter in a restaurant who drops a word or two that have nothing to do with the bill of fare. Once a cook in white cap and apron ran out to greet me, regardless of the crowd of passers-by. Wherever it may be, there are always the glad smiles and the few earnest words that send me on my way saying, "It is all well worth while."

Some gentlemen in an office were discussing the possibility of the reformation of prisoners, and questions were exchanged concerning the stamp of men reached at Hope Hall and their sincerity. After the conversation had been carried on for some time, one of the gentlemen said, "Well, I am one of Mrs. Booth's 'boys.'"

It is all these pleasant surprises by the way that are helping to prove to us how far-reaching and successful the work has already become.

*From After Prison—What? by Maude Ballington Booth. A book of remarkable interest, telling the story of Mrs. Booth's efforts to help the inmates of various state prisons. It is a strong plea for "her boys," as she calls the prisoners, and it proves, by many cases of genuine conversion and reclamation from criminal lives to lives of Christian usefulness, that the effort in behalf of these neglected ones is very far from being thrown away. The extract above relates some of the consolations of Mrs. Booth's prison labors. 290 pages, cloth binding. Price $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, Chicago, and Toronto, publishers.

A GREAT COMMISSION

Solomon Solemnly Appointed as the Temple-Builder

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE last years of David were spent in making preparation for the building of the temple. He might not himself build it, but he would do his part, and out of the riches which had come to him by the spoils of the enemies of Israel he made extensive preparation for the work, and he instructed his son Solomon in private, before he gave him a public charge, to build the house of the Lord.

There is something very touching in the picture of this old man, whose strength was so fast failing, throwing himself into the work of the preparation for the temple building. And he commanded all the princes of Israel to help Solomon, his son, appealing to them on the ground that God had given them rest, and delivered the inhabitants of the land into the hand of David, and "the land was subdued before the Lord and before his people"; and therefore it was but due to him that they should do their best to serve him. It was about this time that David made Solomon, his son, king over Israel. This step was hastened by the rebellion of Adonijah, David's fourth son, who proclaimed himself king, as Absalom, his elder brother, had done before; and he drew away from their allegiance both Abiathar the priest and Joab, who both had hitherto stood faithfully by David. But Nathan the prophet stirred up Bathsheba to go in and tell the king, arranging that he would follow her into David's presence and confirm these tidings; and David, learning of Adonijah's assumption, was aroused, and instantly gave orders for the proclamation of Solomon as king (I. Kings 1).

But to the very last, as far as he was able, the aged king was preparing for the building of the temple, which, in his earthly life, he was never to see, and for the services in connection with it, which, in his earthly life, he was never to hear. The Levites, the singers, the doorkeepers of the coming temple, were all thought of and arranged for by David; and we are told of the appointment of officers for everything in connection with the temple (I. Chron. 16: 37-42; 23-26). It is worth while to read carefully through these chapters, and to compare them with the order given for the restitution of these services in Ezek. 40-46. David prepared the men to minister before the temple which should be built by his son Solomon. We have yet to learn whether the empty temple which Ezekiel saw, will be standing in the Holy Land before the "all righteous" people of Israel are brought back to possess their possessions (Ob. 17), and to offer sacrifices in righteousness (Mal. 3: 3).

Why did David thus throw his heart into the building and organization of the temple worship? This man after God's own heart, fully realized that the worship of God and his service was the real end of the existence of man—that God first, our fellow-creatures next, and ourselves last, is the truly Scriptural, and therefore Divine, order of things.

After having charged Solomon in private, David called together a representative assembly, that he might repeat the charge in the most solemn and public manner. The elders of his people must bear witness to and countenance the honor which should be done to the God of Israel in the sight of the nations. Thus, elders, warriors and business men must take part in this work which lay so near the heart of David, of honoring God; it must be a national matter, and not a private enterprise.

Let us notice here that God permitted the house to be built; but David, although so near to God, might not build it. God has a will about who shall build his sanctuary. If David might not build the temple, can those beautiful and tasteful cathedrals be pleasing in his eyes which have been built by some very sinful man in the past, to atone for the sin by which the money was obtained which was afterwards spent in the building? Has God signified his acceptance of them?

And again, let us notice that, in view of the building of the temple, the king's words to his elders was on the point of searching out all God's commandments to do them.

Relieved without Medicine

Treatment FREE—On Approval

Every reader of The Christian Herald can try FREE a pair of Magic Foot Drafts, famed all over the world for the relief of every curable kind of rheumatism—chronic or acute, Muscular, Sciatic, Lumbago, Gout, etc., no matter where located or how severe. They almost always relieve, so the makers decided to take all the risk. Try the Drafts. You don't send a penny until you are satisfied with he help you get. They are safe and comfortable—ar bette and surer than any medicine.

Magic Foot Drafts work like Magic. Relieved patients tell us they perform miracles. They do not. They are scientific—logical. The foot pores, the largest in the body, are located over rich nerve and vascular centers. The Draft on the foot acts through them on every part of the body—relieving Rheumatism no matter where located. Our booklet makes the reason clear. 68% of the nitrogen in the sweat absorbed by Magic Foot Drafts is in the form of the poison Urea (uric acid) which causes Rheumatism. But we don't ask you to believe even our thousands of relieved patients—we will relieve you. If you have rheumatism, send us your name and we will send you a pair of Magic Foot Drafts, free on approval. If you are satisfied with the benefit received, then send us one dollar for the Drafts. If not, keep your money. Write to-day to the Magic Foot Draft Company, RA 21 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Michigan. Send no money.

A BEAUTIFUL LIFE ENDED

MISS LOUISE B. PIERSON, OF CALCUTTA, INDIA, CALLED TO HER REWARD . . . .

NEWS comes from India of a bereavement, which causes deep sorrow, not only to a large circle of personal friends, but to the Woman's Union Missionary Society, and many people who are interested in missionary work among the women and girls of India. It announces the death of Miss Louise B. Pierson, the beloved daughter of Dr. A. T. Pierson. Coming so soon after the death of Miss S. F. Gardner, of the same mission, whose friend and helper she was, the loss of Miss Pierson's beautiful personality is very severe. For her distinguished father, whose work in the cause of missions is known the world over, there must be deep sympathy and sincere prayer that the Lord, whom he has served so faithfully through a long life, may console him in his sorrow.

MISS LOUISE B. PIERSON

Miss Pierson was thirty-nine years of age. She was born at Waterford, N.Y., and was educated at Mt. Holyoke Seminary and the Bible Institute. Her heart had long been drawn to the foreign field, and in 1901 the way was opened for her to give her life to the work. It was especially to the women and girls of India that her sympathies were attracted, and as the work of the Women's Union Missionary Society has been so well directed and so successful in that sphere, it was to that Society that she offered her services. They were gladly accepted, and on November 16, 1901, she sailed for Calcutta.

The conditions she encountered there, must have convinced her of the need of such help as she was specially fitted to give. "These first weeks in India," she wrote soon after her arrival, "have been full of the deepest interest and full of heartache too, for misery and degradation and sin abound on every side." She entered enthusiastically into the work, and as she was blessed with a singularly sweet voice and a good knowledge of music, she was able to enliven the services by Gospel song, even before she had sufficiently mastered the language to give addresses in the vernacular.

Miss Pierson's personality won its way with remarkable rapidity among the girls of India, who are, as a rule, far from impressible. They seemed to love her from the beginning, and to seek original ways of showing their affection. Their regard for her touched her deeply. "A few days ago," she wrote in one of her letters home, "after speaking and singing to a room full of girls, I suddenly felt some one touch me from behind, and then a little brown arm slipped around my waist, and a little dark head was laid against my arm, and a pair of brown eyes looked lovingly up into mine. Dear little cheerless ones, their days of happy childhood are few, and some have none at all!" When her meetings broke up, it was pathetic to witness the anxiety of the children to serve her in some slight way. The girls would struggle for the honor of carrying a book or a parasol for her, and as she went along the narrow street, she was attended like a princess by a long procession of ardent admirers. There was a tender magnetism about her that attracted the love of all. Perhaps the secret lay in the love that she gave to those needy ones, whose lives are so empty and whose lot is so sad.

Only two short years did she labor in her chosen field. They were years of bright usefulness, with the promise of still more beneficent service. But the promise was not fulfilled. Her Master called her, and she has gone to Him for nearer service in his presence. The loss is ours, and is felt most of all by the girls into whose life her presence brought sunshine and hope. We can but hope that her bright example and her Christian teaching, even in the short space of her earthly labor, may have left a permanent impression on those whom she loved and served.

HIS COMING

WHAT will you do if Jesus comes
Whilst you loiter along the way,
Will your heart be light and your eyes grow bright
As though working instead of play?

What will you do if he finds you sad
In the midst of your sun-crowned life,
Will your glad new song ring as clear and strong
As though braving the bitter strife?

What will you do if he comes when sin
Has been gaining a place in your heart,
Will your rapture then be as sweet as when
You were crushing each poisoned dart?

What will you do if he finds no soul
Has been helped by your care and love,
Will you miss a gem from your diadem
That will sweeten your joy above?

Make beautiful, then, the life he gave,
That his coming may prove it fair,
And the trust is yours till he claims his own
When he makes up his jewels there.

They Appreciate "The Christian Herald"

The Y. M. C. A. of Warren, Pa., is noted far and wide for its range of activity, both locally and in the foreign field. The city is situated on the banks of a beautiful river, along which have been erected extensive works, making the town a great industrial centre. Hundreds of men are employed in these various enterprises, and the Y. M. C. A. has established noon meetings five days in the week among these sons of toil. The association subscribes for 400 copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These come to them weekly, and are given out to the men at the close of the meeting. After speaking at the Iron Foundry a few days ago, where about 200 men gathered to listen, there was a great rush in one direction, and as I looked for the cause of the sudden move I saw the secretary cut the rope on the great bundle of CHRISTIAN HERALDS, while scores of outstretched hands were eagerly trying to secure a copy of the popular paper. The men belong to the class of sturdy toilers who help to form the backbone of industrial life upon which the success of the nation depends. They are intelligent, honest, hardworking men. They need just what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives them, and I doubt if a more effective means of bringing the Gospel to the home and to the individual could be employed, than sending this messenger of truth to the men. Their great appreciation was evinced in their eagerness to secure a copy. God bless the effort. JESSIE ACKERMANN.

USES OF PRAYER*

Four Suggestions to Earnest Seekers After Spiritual Progress

FOUR important matters in connection with prayer are cited in the texts associated with the Topic. One of these is the assurance that if we draw nigh to God, he will draw nigh to us; a second is that we may gain a knowledge of his will by prayer; a third, that by prayer we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need; and the fourth, that in answer to prayer, God will send laborers into his harvest field. So encouraged, there would seem no need to urge Christians to seek God. These are precisely the blessings the child of God needs, and in these passages he is taught how he may obtain them.

When we consider the extent of the universe, the number of worlds larger than our own, and the probability of many of them being inhabited; when we consider, too, the millions in our own world who are serving God and looking to him for the supply of their need, we might well doubt the possibility of our gaining the attention of the Most High. It is, therefore, well that we have the assurance that we draw nigh to him, he will draw nigh to us. We cannot always understand such condescension, but we accept the promise in all gratitude and avail ourselves of it.

That we may gain a knowledge of his will by prayer is a most important fact. There is much in the Bible to help us to such knowledge, but in every man's life difficulties arise, in which the path of duty, even in the light of the Scriptures, is by no means clear. We need light on our daily path, we need direction in unforeseen circumstances, we need to have the conscience instructed so that we may be able to discern clearly right from wrong, and know in what way we can most truly and successfully serve him in the world. Grace is needed, too, as well as mercy. We are, at the best, feeble instruments, unworthy servants, in frequent need of forgiveness for negligence, and even for disobedience, and for yielding to temptation. No employer would retain in his service employees who are so remiss as we are in God's service. Yet he is patient and forbearing, and we hope that he will forgive. We need to tell him that, and to ask him for that grace to do better which he is so willing to bestow.

Finally, for the maintenance and extension of his kingdom in the world we are anxious. Evil is rampant and subtle, and it sometimes seems as if it was getting the upper hand. What will the next generation be? Laborers, earnest, skilful, consecrated, will be sorely needed to take the place of those we are laying in the grave. We are taught to ask God for them. Surely these are all strong incentives to prayer.

It Cheered His Sick-room

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK, President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, who was recently attacked by a thug while arresting an offender against public morality, is still suffering from the effects of his injuries. From his sick-room at Summit, N. J., he writes as follows:

"Society for the Suppression of Vice,
New York, Oct. 30, 1903.

"Dear Dr. Klopsch: I want to thank you with all my heart for the beautiful Red Letter Testament, and to assure you that the benediction that accompanied it brought great cheer into my sick-room. I know of no finer gift to any person than one of these beautiful Testaments. What a centre for radiating sweet and holy and inspiring influences your office is! How manifold are your spheres of usefulness! How wonderfully has God's blessing followed your efforts for good, and how rich the results.

"Enclosed please find my check for $5.00, in payment of following subscriptions and premiums, to wit: 1. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Miss Florence Comstock, P. O. Box 274, Milford, Conn., for one year. 2. Renewal subscription to Anthony Comstock, 35 Beekman road, Summit, N. J., from January 1, 1904 (at which time present subscription expires) for one year thereafter till January 1, 1905.

"Wishing you every success in all your efforts for good, I remain, sincerely yours,

"ANTHONY COMSTOCK."

Poverty and Intemperance

Intemperance is the cause of poverty, I know; but there is another side to that: poverty is the cause of intemperance. Crowd a man with fourteen hours' work a day, and you crowd him down to a mere animal life. You will eclipse his aspirations, dull his tastes, stunt his intellect, and make him a mere tool, to work fourteen hours, and catch a thought in the interval; and, while one man in a hundred will rise to be a genius, ninety-nine will cower down under the circumstances.

Now I say, lift a man, give him life, let him work eight hours a day, give him the school, develop his taste for music, give him a garden, give him beautiful things to see, and good books to read, and you will starve out those lower appetites. Give a man a chance to earn a good living, and you may save his life.—WENDELL PHILLIPS.

Modern Merchandising

Laying in Supplies: Living from hand to mouth is one way of living, but why not get your supplies on a wholesale basis and avoid the petty annoyances of retail buying, to say nothing of making four dollars go as far as five dollars used to. That's the grocery list you see hanging on the wall. Supplied with loops to hang up with. A postal will bring it. Nothing like groceries for a foundation for a 100-lb. freight shipment.

Have you ever stopped to think about the question of getting your household supplies to the best advantage? Are you perfectly satisfied with the way things are running—with the prices you pay, the quality of the goods, the range of selection and the general question of making both ends meet? Perhaps you buy your supplies from the cross-roads store, just because your grandfather did. Perhaps you are tied up to the general store because you can trade in your butter and eggs at a low price and take it out in trade at a high price. Possibly you have never thought about it one way or the other. It is time to think. You have got to live and support your family. Your income is limited to so many dollars per year, and you have got to figure out the expense account so that things will come out right at the end of the year. If you can make both ends meet nicely and lay aside a tidy sum for a rainy day, you are only doing what every head of a family should endeavor to do, and if you don't do it you are simply inviting misery for the next time the crop fails. If a dollar looks as big to you as we think it does, we want you to think over this question of modern merchandising and see just what it means. It means different things to different people. To some it means buying everything on credit, then mortgaging the farm when settlement day comes around. Others think goods cheaper the further away in economy—the cheap, worthless trash that is advertised as heavenly at "the greatest price on earth." Many people send off to the city and get a jack knife at a 25 cents saving, and then fall back into the old rut in buying the balance of their supplies. Our idea of modern merchandising is to supply all your wants—everything you eat, wear or use—for yourself, your family and the hired man, at an average saving of 15 to 40 per cent, which means that if your yearly purchases amount to $200, you can save something like $30, or $40 if it runs $400 a year to live. Are you so well off that $100 or even $80 does not interest you? Then again consider the advantages. A commonly reliable merchandise of the very best quality and an unlimited range of selection. New goods. Prompt service. Prices that spell economy—and the certain knowledge that absolute satisfaction is the keynote to every transaction. To make trading with us possible we issue a catalogue of 128 pages, in which almost everything imaginable, including Vehicles and Farm Implements, is illustrated, described and priced. This catalogue can be absolutely depended upon and enables you to select your entire bill of merchandise without hurry or confusion and with the certainty that everything will be found exactly as described or you need not keep it. We ask you to get one of your nearest neighbors and give our methods a trial. We satisfy others and will satisfy you. There never was a better time than right now to begin, for we have just issued a new catalogue full of the things you will need to see you through this winter and you can make no better investment than to fill out this coupon and send it to us now while the subject is in your mind. We ask 15 cents, merely as an evidence of good faith on your part. If you will risk 15 cents, we will risk sending you a catalogue that costs us over half a dollar to print and is so big that it requires 26 cents postage. It is our 76 cents against your 15 cents. Will you do it? Write today.

THE IMPORTED AMERICAN.

Italy is the breeding ground of American immigration, and to study the human side of this great problem LESLIE'S MONTHLY has sent its well-known correspondent, Mr. Broughton Brandenburg, and his wife across the ocean to live with a poor Italian family, and to accompany them in the steerage to this country, learning in an intimate way their fears, their hopes and their ideas of America, and contrasting all this with the realization which comes with their settlement in the promised land. This series is incomparably the most important undertaking of any contemporary magazine.

UP FROM PRISON.

A woman's story of what she had accomplished among the inmates of American prisons. A very personal, touching and significant account of the noble work by Maud Ballington Booth of the "Volunteers" of America.

A WOMAN'S BREAD AND BUTTER.

The story of a girl's fight for life in a great city. Without friends or money she makes her way painfully upward from the "learner's wage" of $1.50 a week. Actual experience like her's make a story wonderfully interesting to practical women.

THE GREAT AMERICAN LOBBY.

The most ominous aspect of the Trust Question is the corrupt influence which our great corporations exercise upon legislation. The Lobby and the Trust "graft" upon each other, and this exposition of their mutual relations in a series of careful and authoritative articles constitute a genuine public service.

Pelman System of Memory Training

SCIENTIFICALLY TRAINS THE NATURAL MEMORY. Requires only a few minutes time each day, and is so simple a child can understand it. It is hard to conceive of any man or woman in any profession, business, trade or calling who could not receive permanent benefit of almost inestimable value from a course of training under THE PELMAN SYSTEM. It will enable any person to remember figures, dates, names, appointments, addresses, speeches, business details, to learn languages, TO AVOID MISTAKES.

A TEST—One should be able to think of a subject for a half hour or an hour at a time, yet we venture that not one person in a thousand can think of one subject for a single minute by the watch, without the mind wandering off to other subjects. Try it yourself. This mind-wandering can be overcome as well as sunrise and taxes by The Pelman System.

W. T. STEAD—Editor of the London Review of Reviews: "The improvement that can be effected is so great that I consider Mr. Pelman one of the benefactors of the human race."

D. F. URBAHNS—Ft. Wayne, Ind., essayist, pronouncing it "superior of any other method for training the memory."

FREE—Mr. Pelman has published two books:—

"Memory Training: Its Laws and Their Application to Practical Life," and

"The Natural Way to Learn a Language."

We will send both books absolutely free, postpaid. Write at once. A thing done now will not require remembering.

HEALTH, STRENGTH, CULTURE

PERFECT HEALTH, PERFECT GRACE
Hence

are more to be desired than a pretty face, and they are yours for just fifteen minutes' intelligent work every day

IT is not only a woman's privilege but her duty to be Well, full of Vivacity, as Beautiful. I wish I could make you realize that true attractiveness is in perfect health, freedom of body, or grace, and in wholesome thoughts. These are yo birthright and may be retained or regained by simply putting yourself in ha mony with Nature—she will do more for you than drugs.

If you are nervous, if your vitality is at a low ebb, if you wish to be relieved any of the so-called chronic ailments, write to me. I can strengthen your vital orga and nerves, bring your figure to symmetrical proportions by reducing prominent abdomens and hips, building up neck, chest, and bust, teach you to breathe, a I can give you a clear skin, a good color, and the delightful magnetism, easy grac and the dignified character which bespeaks at once cultured refinement. The pea will brighten your mind; the world will look sweeter to you, you sweeter to the worl

After twelve years of experience in teaching in person I felt I could reach more women by mail instructio and during the past eighteen months have helped 6,000 women to regain health and good figures. I study your condition and give you just the work adapted to your needs, no more. It is to my close personal attention to every pupil that I attribute my success. The happy, enthusiastic, and appreciative letters received from my pupils daily are a source of great delight and pride, and they speak more for me than I could myself.

The following are from reports taken from the day's mail:

"I will tell you what I have done so far: I have reduced weight 58 pounds, bust 6 inches, waist 4 inches, hips 7 inches, arm 2 inches." [I will send you the name of this lady upon request.]

"Miss Cocroft, you would hardly know me. I have gained 28 pounds."

"The quivering, fluttering sensation in my heart is gone and the neuralgia greatly decreased."

"My kidneys are much better."

"I wish that women would waken up and see what can be done for them."

"This week I have not been troubled with biliousness. I am beginning to think that the age of miracles has not passed."

"My stomach does not trouble me at all now, I can eat anything."

"My entire body feels so comfortable after all these years of utter weakness."

"Just think of it!—to be relieved of constipation! Entirely free, after having it for 30 years."

"You have benefited me greatly—noticeably in the straightening of the lateral curvature in my spine."

"The rheumatism has disappeared and I sleep such a restful sleep."

"I have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of good, quiet nerves."

"My mind is much clearer and my memory is much better."

"I feel so well and my color is so good."

"My eyes are stronger and I have taken off my glasses."

"The pain in the top and back of my head is entirely gone, and just think that it had been there almost all the time for three years!"

"My bust has increased 2 inches in the past three months."

"I am delighted with the effect of the exercises upon my catarrh."

"I have tried your treatment for colds a couple of times and find it works like a charm."

"My circulation is good and I sleep well."

"The improvement in my figure is very gratifying to me."

"I can never thank you enough for opening a higher plan of life for me."

"I now feel cheerful, happy, and so refreshed every morning."

If you will tell me your difficulties I will tell you frankly whether I can help you. I have no wish to take pupils whom I cannot help. Were it not that pupils are finishing their courses daily I could take no new ones.

If you wish I will furnish you with names and addresses of women who have been helped, and who have given me permission to use their names. For ten cents I will send you a little booklet, showing you the correct outlines of the body in poise and movement.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

AN ILLUSTRATED FAMILY MAGAZINE

A JAMAICA MARKETWOMAN

CARRYING BANANAS TO THE WHARF FOR SHIPMENT

LIKE A DESOLATED PARADISE

JAMAICA'S THOUSANDS OF RUINED HOMES — THANKSGIVING AMID AFFLICTION

AMID the joyous sounds of preparation for the Thanksgiving festival, which are heard on every side, there comes a note of sadness. It comes borne on the wind from the West Indies; not from Cuba or Porto Rico—where a considerable proportion of the people will, this year, celebrate somewhat after the American style—but from Jamaica, the beautiful "land of springs," which lies ninety miles to the north of Cuba. This island, justly famed for its natural beauties, is becoming widely known as a resort for those who seek a refuge from the rigors of Northern winters. It lies almost at our gates. Its condition to-day should awaken our sympathies, as we contrast the gloom and distress that prevail there, with the joyous experiences by which we are surrounded. Here we are rejoicing over our bounteous harvests; in Jamaica the people are bemoaning the desolation of their fields and crops, that but a few weeks ago were swept away by the devastating power of the tropical cyclone. Here, our families reunite in the old homes, and the completed circle lives again in the happy memories of the past; there, in the storm-swept island, ten thousand homes lie in ruins, and fifty thousand persons are scattered abroad to find a shelter as best they can. Here, all is gladness and feasting; there, it is sorrow and want.

Letters received within the last few days from different mission centres in Jamaica, show how widespread is the need for the very necessaries of life even at this time, which is usually a season of plenty. From August to February is generally in Jamaica a time for harvesting. Allspice, oranges, coffee, and provisions, follow each other, and in the times of ingathering, there is usually enough to supply present needs, and to lay by a little for coming months. But this year, along the storm-swept coast, the cry for food is already general, and there is no prospect of any relief until the next crops come round, except by the help that may come from more favored lands.

The following extracts from the letters of missionaries who are now in the midst of their distressed people, trying as best they can to answer the many cries for help by which they are surrounded, will give some idea of the state of Jamaica to-day:

"Many sorrowful ones keep coming for sympathy and help," says one writer, "and, so far as I am able, I do what I can, but I do wish that some of the Lord's people would entrust me with a little to meet such cases at this time, as it is not possible for me to help them all."

Another letter says: "The rains have become frequent now, and nature is rejoicing in the refreshing, and is putting on again her robes and covering her wounds and promising great things for the future. It will, however, be a distant future ere the people's help can come from trees or fields. O, the people are pinched and hungry!"

"People are coming all the day," says a third missionary correspondent, "and their needs are great. I can't tell you the number that have come to me to-day."

These missions, that are scattered thickly throughout the island, are the centres to which the whole population (whether members or not) turn for help in all their time of need, and seldom is their cry in vain. Nearly all the religious denominations are established in Jamaica, and among them a happy harmony prevails and a co-operation which is most cordial. All have suffered, and with wrecked churches and demolished mission homes, these brave men are themselves almost driven to despair by the ruins around them. The trouble that has fallen upon themselves and their families, has made them unable to cope with the sorrows of their people. The destruction of mission property by the storm was not less than $250,000, and Christian work along the northern part of the island is totally disorganized until the destroyed churches and mission houses can be rebuilt.

Jamaica, or, as the early Spanish historians wrote it, "Xaymaca," lies in about 18 degrees 12 minutes north latitude, and in 76 degrees 45 minutes west longitude. The island measures 150 miles in length and 50 miles in width. It was discovered by Columbus during his second voyage to the new world, on May 3, 1494. On his last voyage to Hispaniola (Haiti), Columbus encountered such tempestuous weather off Cuba, as compelled him, on June 24, 1503, to seek shelter on the north side of Jamaica, in a harbor now called St. Ann's Bay, but which still retains the name of "Christopher's Cove." The novelty, variety, and beauty of its scenery, so delighted him, that on his return to Spain, when referring to the beauties of the island, he illustrates his description of its hills and valleys, by crumpling a piece of paper in his hand, and throwing it on the table said, "It is just like that." Further, he named this portion of the island the "Santa Gloria," so charmed was he with the beauty of this approach.

Hill, in his Lights and Shadows of Jamaica History, thus writes of this parish: "Earth has nothing more lovely than the pastures and pimento groves of St. Ann; nothing more enchanting than its lofts and vales, delicious in verdure, and redolent with the fragrance of spices. Embellished with wood and water from the deep forests, from whence the streams descend to the ocean in falls, the blue haze of the air blends and harmonizes all into beauty." At a moderate distance from the shore, numerous hills, distinctly separated from each other by romantic vales, appear. Most of the hills are rounded toward their tops with copious coppices, and crowned with groves of pimento, a tree that endures no rival near it, and which produces [illegible] the allspice indigenous only to Jamaica. GOSPEL WORK AMONG THE CHINESE, HEBREWS AND ITALIANS OF NEW YORK

HOW cosmopolitan a city New York is, may be realized by a visit to the mission Miss Helen F. Clark is conducting in Mott street. As we have mentioned in former articles on the subject, Miss Clark has for several years taken a deep interest in the Chinese population, especially the women and children. The work has not been without its difficulties, and there have been some efforts on the part of people interested in the degradation of the Chinese to thwart her projects; but the work has survived and is still being prosecuted with encouraging results. Miss Clark is also laboring among the Italians and with similar effect. For a time the City Mission and Tract Society took the work under its auspices, but it is now again an independent mission, the support of which comes from people who know its character and the urgent need there is for such an effort.

THE CHINESE SCHOOL AT 21 MOTT STREET, NEW YORK

Gradually, a corps of helpers is being formed, as the work has extended, and it is now hoped that being more thoroughly systematized, still better results may be attained. Eight workers, besides Miss Clark herself, are now engaged. A Night School for Chinese is conducted by Miss Mary Banta; Sewing Classes for Women and Girls by Miss Bailey; Chinese work in the Home and in the Mission by Sene Wye and Mrs. Loo Lin, both converted Chinese. Miss Stuart and Miss Harwood conduct a Kindergarten; Mr. Savarese is laboring among the Italians, under the auspices of the mission, and Miss Gertrude Goldstein has organized a Hebrew Sewing School. As soon as the funds will admit of an extension, the Italian work will be separated from the Chinese, and will have headquarters of its own in Bayard street. Arrangements to effect this desirable improvement have already been begun, and suitable premises have been found, and the rent has been pledged by some Young People's Societies.

There are, it appears, fifty-six Chinese women in the city, and all these have been visited by Miss Clark and her helpers. They have found them open to Christian influence, and such hopes are entertained of bringing at least some of them into Christian churches. They willingly allow their children to attend the kindergarten, and seem to be grateful for the care bestowed upon them.

During the summer, open air services were held in neighborhoods frequented by Italians. The preaching was in Italian as well as English. The audiences were large and attentive, and many who were attracted by the sound of the native tongue, afterward attended the meetings at the mission. Altogether it is believed that not less than ten thousand Italians have heard the Gospel at these open-air services. This work is also of more important because of the anarchistic, and extreme socialistic doctrines which are now spreading among the Italian immigrants.

Miss Clark is now receiving sufficient support from individuals, Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies to meet the current expenses of the mission. She is, however, embarrassed by a debt of about $1,[illegible] which accumulated during an illness, from which she suffered some months ago, when it was impossible for her to give her attention to the raising of funds, and which is still unpaid. Contributions toward the liquidation of this incubus, or to the extension of the work, sent to this office, 92 Bible House, New York, will be forwarded to her.

TWENTY-SIX YEARS OF SOUL-WINNING

IT is now twenty-six years since Chicago's Pacific Garden Mission was founded and incorporated under the laws of Illinois. For many years it was entirely supported by its founders, Col. and Mrs. George R. Clarke. Col. Clarke has passed on to his reward, but Mrs. Clarke is still the Superintendent and the motive power of the Pacific Garden Mission. When first established, the Mission was flanked on each side by a saloon; both saloons were soon forced to close, and their musician being converted, became organist of the Mission.

GEORGE H. CLARKE

The Mission headquarters are at 100 East Van Buren street, where light, music, and cheering words are a counter-attraction to the saloons and dens of vice which abound in that part of the city. Here nightly, at half past seven o'clock, may be heard the little organ accompanying hearty voices in singing Gospel songs. As the sweet strains proclaiming the "Old, Old Story," are wafted to the street, one by one, passers-by are attracted and enter. Some come from curiosity, others from a desire to hear the music; some are won by the kindly hand-clasp and the cheery "Come in, brother"; a few unfortunates stagger to seats in the condition to which drink has reduced them. Thus, from various motives, they gather there; and as hymn after hymn is sung, interspersed with cheerful and encouraging addresses, the faces in the audience, as seen from the platform, are a study.

Solos and duets are sung, suitable portions of Scripture are read, and earnest Gospel addresses and prayer are followed by more singing. On Tuesday night, the Rev. Mr. Jones and his wife may be found blending their sweet voices in the Gospel invitation in song, while ears accustomed to blasphemy listen to the words:

I heard the voice of Jesus say,
Come unto me and rest.

Prayer is offered for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, then there is an address full of the Gospel call "Come!"

Respectable-looking men and women form a goodly sprinkling in these meetings; some are present to testify to what the mission has done to help them to become trusted employes, respected business men, or enthusiastic Christian workers. In many cases the speakers, in testifying, refer to the time when they looked out from behind prison bars, in stolid indifference or hopeless despair. Here and there are men with bloated faces and heavy eyes; yet showing in these defaced images of Divinity the battle that is being waged between an awakened conscience and the powers of evil; men weary of sin and of the misery that comes from it, hesitating to take the decisive step; and some with closed eyes still heavy with the effects of drink, to whose dulled ears are wafted echoes of a long ago, when, at some mother's knee, they sang redeeming love and lisped an evening prayer.

When testimonies are called for the interest is intensified. Personal experience comes with a directness most convincing. A man who has been in the clutches of delirium comes into the Mission hall and is, as it were, transfixed by the appeals made. He eagerly takes hold of the helping hand extended to him. A mere boy who for a year has persistently used cocaine, asks for prayer in his behalf. A man who has gambled away his all, and is ready to risk his very soul on a throw of the dice, is arrested in his desperate career, and as evidence takes the place of chance in his heart, all desire for the gaming-table or the ticker vanishes, nor does the fever ever return.

The most solemn feature of the evening service is the ingathering. As rapidly as hands indicate the desire for prayer, each penitent is invited to come forward to the platform, where helpful words are spoken, prayer is offered, and Testaments are distributed.

The sole object of this mission is to lead the sinner to Jesus, and let Him do the rest. Such a work can never be circumscribed, and it is not surprising that from Pacific Garden Mission have developed many noble Gospel agencies, including rescue missions throughout the Northwest, a free kindergarten, street preaching, and work among prisoners. Many have been soundly converted under the influence of its ministrations. The work includes the free distribution of tracts and Gospels, visitation of the sick, relief of the destitute, and the reclamation of drunkards and thieves.

Mr. Harry Monroe, Assistant Superintendent, is a great force in the meeting by his hearty leadership in the singing; and his cheery, happy face going far to encourage those whose hearts have been touched by the services, while the energy and enthusiasm which Mrs. Clarke brings to her self-imposed duties, inspires her associates in this soul-winning work.

PREACHING THE GOSPEL TO THE PRISONERS

Two Mary Smiths

AND

One Thanksgiving Dinner

BY

MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

IT was the breakfast table of Miss Mary Smith No. 1, and a very little breakfast table it was in every sense of the word. Little as to size, and exceedingly small as to the meal spread upon it. Also, Miss Mary Smith herself was a diminutive woman; so much so, that she was commonly known in the suburb of Riverdale, where she resided, as "Little Miss Smith."

Of course, Miss Smith was poor, or she would have had more for breakfast than a slice of baker's bread, a pat of butter you could cover with a good sized thimble, a tablespoonful of meat hash, and a very weak cup of coffee without sugar or milk; especially when she was hungry as she was that cold November morning, just three days before Thanksgiving.

Yes, the little gray-haired lady, fifty-five years old come Christmas, was much in want of a sufficiency of this world's goods, but her poverty was of a most genteel and respectable kind. It never was allowed to trouble anyone but herself. If her breakfast was meagre and unsatisfying, she ate more largely of the bread of Life, sang more blithely and walked more gaily with the young folks who passed her door. Indeed, she was as cheery as her own sweet songbird, the golden canary, who swung in his cage in the south window and poured forth a flood of melody all day long.

Little Miss Smith had lived in the beautiful suburb of Riverdale for many years: ever since her parents died, in fact. "It was quieter there than in the city," she said, and that was true; but it was cheaper, also, much cheaper, and little Miss Smith was obliged to bring her expenditures within the narrow compass of the hundred dollars a year allowed her by her only living relative, a well-to-do brother residing in a distant city. How she managed to exist on so small an annuity no one knew, though the question was often asked and pondered over. That she did live, and seemed to live well, was what the public, easily satisfied by a respectable outward appearance, said, and the decision of the public always settled everything; but perhaps the questioners might have understood the matter better had they seen the one small slice of baker's bread, the tablespoonful of hash, the tiny fire which was expected to heat both rooms—for Miss Smith used a small oil stove on which to cook her meals—and the carefully-preserved twelve-year-old brown.

Although Miss Smith's circumstances were not known, she was well-known and loved and respected, not only in the suburb of Riverdale, but in the city to which it belonged. She had many friendly acquaintances and some good acquaintances among the more wealthy families; to be sure they were a little inclined to be patronizing, but they remembered Miss Smith's father and mother when they occupied a very enviable social position, and when he was judge of a circuit court; and, remembering her as a part of their fallen fortunes, sometimes drove out in their shining carriages to see how she got along, and instead of seeing her poverty—which, indeed, was always hidden as far away as it could be—saw her two eminently respectable rooms, adorned by the excellent, old-fashioned furniture which had descended to her from the parental home, wearing rather an aristocratic air, and herself in her black dress, so carefully darned and sponged and pressed, with the neat linen collar and cuffs, and their verdict was that "Really Miss Mary was very nicely fixed indeed. So comfortable and cozy; and they understood that her brother sent her, regularly, a hundred dollars a year. Really very good of her brother; extremely considerate and generous."

At church, too, where she always worshiped each Sabbath, always in the same black silk dress she had worn for twelve successive years, the same bonnet with the velvet ribbon and purple violets, the same shawl folded in a triangle, they thought her very ancient in fashion and peculiar in manner, but quite well enough off to sign subscription papers, which of course she did, going without any breakfast at all, to pay them, oftentimes. If you had asked about her, almost anybody would have said: "Little Miss Smith? Why, no, she isn't poor. She is odd and old-fashioned, the queerest little body you ever saw. Everbody likes her though, she is so nice and kind." And that would have been the end of it.

After this lengthy introduction you ought to know little Miss Smith pretty well; and you will not be surprised to learn that, being of a social turn, and having few to talk to in the course of the day, she not only directed much conversation to her bird Fluff; but also talked much to herself, or, if you like it better, mused aloud. So it came to pass, that this morning, as she ate her slender breakfast, she gazed out of the window and kept up a pleasant chatter regarding her neighbors.

"Dear, dear, dear me!" she exclaimed, all of a flutter, "Parson's grocery wagon is stopping at Mrs Bascom's for the second time this morning, and there is Rogers going to Peterson's with a load. They must both be making very extensive preparations for Thanksgiving this year. My, my! what a monstrous turkey! It weighs from fifteen to twenty pounds, I'll venture, Fluff.

"What nonsense!" said old Mr. Montague. "Why have you dropped her, my dear?"

And there goes a bushel basket loaded to the top. There is a great deal of money in that basket, Fluff. I should like you to count it up if you could. A great deal of money to be eaten in one dinner. Ah!" with a tender little sigh, "I didn't use to think much of it myself, once, Fluff, in the good old days when I lived at home with my dear old father and mother. Before they died, and the property was found to be—well, not at all valuable—that is, you know, Fluff, quite involved. I'm not intending to complain, Fluff; not at all. I should be ashamed to do that when I think of all the blessings the dear Lord has given me; but I do confess that I would dearly love to taste one of those good old dinners once more. I do wonder if I can afford a chicken for Thanksgiving this year a very little chicken. A chicken and dressing and gravy would taste mighty good, together with a bunch of celery and a dish of cranberries. It may be a wild, extravagant thought, Fluff, but I have a mind to look in my pocket-book and see if I can afford it," and away she went to the upper bureau drawer and brought forth her terribly thin little purse.

Pouring out the few pieces of small change on the table, she carefully counted it over some half dozen times to make sure, then she gravely shook her head.

"I guess we can't do it this time, Fluff, dear. I guess we'd better not. I haven't quite as much money as I thought, and the rent is to be paid next week. You know I'll get a nickel soup-bone. Soup is nourishing and goes further than chicken, and I can make a very thankful dinner out it, very. And there will be the celery and cranberries. I really think, Fluff, I can manage them."

A knock at the door, causing little Miss Smith to spring out of her chair with a nervous little scream. But it was only the pleasant postman, who seldom brought her anything but her weekly religious paper and the semi-annual check from her brother in Chicago. He now held out a dainty envelope directed upon which was her name in the daintiest of hand-writing.

"Looks like a good one," said the cheery postman. "It's a good time to get letters now so near Thanksgiving. There's generally a big turkey always enclosed in 'em." And then he laughed cheerily as he ran down the steps and whistled for the next house.

In the flutter of seeing a real letter, Little Miss Smith took the letter into her inner apartment and opened it with the utmost care. Sure enough it was a formal invitation to the Montague's to dine with them on Thanksgiving dinner. The Montagues, old aristocratic acres and one time quite wealthy, pleased her greatly, but be mastered by the force of circumstances and the lapse of years. Dear, dear dear me! That they should think of her! She would write a grateful acceptance at once on some of the so-called paper she kept for very special occasions, in the very best style. What was a very good style by the way—and then she must look to her silk dress and bonnet. As she needed no Thanksgiving dinner now, she would buy a few little trifles to freshen up her old garb and help it to pass muster.

While she is doing this in such a glow of happiness as she had not experienced for many a year, we will introduce to you the second Miss Mary Smith of Riverdale for whom—and the invitation was really intended. This Mary Smith was a young lady, one of Fortune's favorites, an heiress in prospect, of more than a million, and a resident of Riverdale for only a few weeks as yet. Her father had recently purchased a fine property on the Heights, almost a mile from the centre of the village. The postman's route did not reach there and the mistake was made in this way. This Mary Smith, repudiating her name as old fashioned, spelled it sometimes Marie, and oftener Mae. Mrs Montague, not being well instructed upon this point, and very anxious to cultivate the acquaintance of the wealthy resident of Riverdale Heights, had written the address in what she considered the proper way. There was a discussion among the daughters when the note of acceptance arrived. There were two married daughters home for Thanksgiving, besides the two single ones, and they remarked upon the matter in special session.

"It doesn't look like Mae's writing one bit," said one of the single daughters. "It is neat enough, but so precise and——"

"The paper is handsome, but old," said another. "At least it looks so. How quaint!"

"It is strange there is no monogram on it," said another. "Miss Mae is always so particular about that. Mamma, you wrote the invitation; how did you address it?"

"Why, Miss Mary Smith, to be sure. Isn't that all right?"

"I don't know," said one of her married daughters. "I am much afraid it is all wrong. But there is no use to rectify mistakes now."

"It it should be that little Miss Smith, the queer of Riverdale, I should die," said Miss Isabel. "We used to know her, you know, at home, you remember, Oh, goodness! Such a little dowdy as she is. What would we do with her at dinner? There's Mrs. and Howards, and Professor Hudgens, [illegible]

"What are you talking about?" exclaimed Mr. Montague, a silver-haired old gentleman approaching [illegible]

A Happy Thanksgiving

AT this season of universal rejoicing, when we prepare the Thanksgiving feast, let us not forget that our own joy will be made the more complete, if we can bring, by generous remembrances on that day, a gleam of sunshine and good cheer into some home of poverty and sadness.

There is no joy like the joy of doing good to others. Search out the poorest and neediest in your neighborhood—there are few neighborhoods without them—and as far as lies within your power, try to make the day to them one of real rejoicing. See to it that no one within your reach goes hungry on Thanksgiving Day.

Though your own circumstances may be far from affluent, remember that there are many much poorer, and your humble meal will be all the sweeter for being shared with others. If Providence has blessed you with an abundance of the good things of this life, your banquet will be the princelier and your heart the lighter, when you sit down with your guests, if you know that your bounty has replenished some poor man's table, or gladdened the heart of some humble mother, who will speak your name with a blessing, as her hungry children eat their Thanksgiving dinner.

Yours should be a feast, the pure enjoyment of which is heightened by the knowledge that your table is set not in your own comfortable house alone, but that it reaches out to the tenement and the hovel, and that guests unseen, but grateful, are banqueting with you.

On such a Thanksgiving feast the Divine blessing will descend in double measure. May that joy be experienced in every home into which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes.

We wish all of our friends—every member of the world-wide CHRISTIAN HERALD family — a Happy Thanksgiving.

The Next Revival

MANY Christian people, who have long been praying for a revival, which, like those of past years, should sweep through the country and reach to other lands, have been grievously disappointed that, as the months have passed, no tidings of its beginning have reached their ears. True, conversions are taking place in all the churches, the gifts of the people to Christian causes were never so large, and the average attendance on divine worship is maintained; but the great revival, such as Finney led, and which followed the early labors of Moody and Sankey, comes not. The question is now raised on the other side of the Atlantic, whether we are justified in looking for a movement of that kind.

In an address recently delivered to college students, the Rev. John Watson—better known as Ian Maclaren—suggests that the new awakening, when it does come, will prove to be something entirely different from the former movements, and, indeed, diverse from anything hitherto known. He points out that the religious movements of history have not been duplications; that the message which stirred the people under Moody, differed from that delivered by Wesley, and that again, from the Puritan movement, as that, in its turn, differed from the Reformation in the sixteenth century. Each was adapted to its own time, and was in accord with the spirit which was affecting men in other spheres. Are we then justified, he asks, in expecting a repetition of the "large meetings with the machinery of inquiry-rooms, penitent forms and open professions?" Will it not rather be in some new way that God will manifest himself, as the old way was itself new in its time?

Casting about for some clue that may guide our expectation, Dr. Watson cites the change in the movements of the present time from individualism to collectivism. The new awakening, he thinks, will be in the direction of social righteousness and will be directed to the social betterment of the people. He says:

The new Prophet will preach the Gospel of social deliverance; that the white female slaves who sew from morning till night, and half through the night, and hardly get the wherewithal to keep soul and body together, should be delivered from their bondage; that every laborer who is willing and temperate should have his living wage wherewith to keep himself and his family; that every citizen, however humble, should have his own little home wherein to live in peace and comfort; that the countryman should not be evicted from the land to make room for wild animals and rich men's sport; that the owners of insanitary property should be punished and not compensated; that temptations should not be placed at every street corner in the way of the poor and miserable, that every man should have free access to education, to the country, to health and just enjoyment, and that the burden of weariness and sickness and tyranny should be lifted from the shoulders of them who labor and are heavy laden.

Two classes will be benefited, Dr. Watson contends, by such a movement: the rich, who will be shaken out of their self-complacency and selfishness, and will discover that he who loses his life shall save it; and the poor, who now believe that the Church cares nothing for their condition, but will gladly listen, when the Church champions their cause and throws in her lot with the common people.

Very welcome would such a movement be, but does it cover the whole ground? Does it touch the vital spring of true religion? There must come, before all that outward manifestation, a revival of faith in God and in the Word. The evil of the present day is that men do not believe in God, in the efficacy of prayer, in the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel, as did their fathers. In business, in politics and in daily life, there is an excession of religion, a tendency to keep that for Sunday and to forget or ignore the immanence of God and the nature of his requirements. Until there is a widespread and profound revival of faith and a realization of religion as a true and living force, we can expect no such awakening as Dr. Watson sketches.

It is for that revival that we must hope and pray.

Concerning Life Subscriptions

THE following appeal appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 19th and of September 9th.

A Blessed Opportunity

We are greatly in need of a new chapel at Mont-Lawn, the present one being altogether too small for our needs, and in such a rickety condition that only last year we found it necessary to brace the walls in order to prevent their falling.

While we have found our subscribers ever willing to contribute to the support of this glorious work—and how greatly we appreciate their generosity is more than we dare undertake to state—We do not think that they should be burdened with any share of the expenses incident to the raising of a new building—even though that building be a chapel dedicated to the service of our Master — and the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has devised a plan which, we believe, will furnish the necessary funds, without entailing any hardships too grievous to be conveniently borne.

As the Mont-Lawn work has fully established its claim to permanency, nothing less than a stone chapel will fill our requirements, and one large enough to accommodate not less than 400 auditors. Our children and the helpers, even at the present time, aggregate nearly 300—then there are the visitors and villagers, and finally, we must provide for natural growth with the course of time.

To erect such a spacious and substantial chapel, with all the necessary furnishings, together with administration quarters, and rooms for the entertainment of visiting friends, especially visiting CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers, would require not less than $20,000.

Fifteen Per Cent. Annuity

This money we propose to raise by selling 2,000 Life Subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (donated for that purpose by its proprietor), at $10 each. A Life Subscription causes your name, or the name of any one you may wish thus to favor, to be placed for life upon the subscription list of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Each ten dollar subscription thus pays to the fortunate subscriber every year an annual subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, worth $1.50 per annum, equal to a life annuity of 15 per cent. on the investment, and at the same time contributes $10 to the erection of a Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn. Finally, these two thousand Life Subscribers will have a share in the blessings daily prayed by the little ones down from heaven upon the hearts and the lives of those who had helped in the erection of this house of worship and of praise.

No other Life Subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have ever been accepted, and none will be accepted, as far as we can now tell, except such as come properly within the scope of the offer here published. If our readers will kindly remember this it will obviate much useless correspondence.

Let all who are interested, address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City, and place at the left hand lower corner of the envelope the words "For the Children's Temple."

In response to this appeal, a considerable number of life subscriptions have been received, and the following letter, which may be of interest to our readers, has just been sent out to such Life Subscribers.

OFFICE OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

DEAR FRIEND:

Concerning the Life Subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which you were good enough to send us in interest of The Children's Temple, to be erected on grounds of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Ho at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, New York, we respectfully requ the following information:

1. Full Name of Life Subscriber. 2. Age of Life S scriber. 3. Present Address of Life Subscriber. 4. Sig ture in own Handwriting of Life Subscriber.

A certificate for a Life Subscription will be promptly f warded upon receipt of the above information.

Conditions of Life Subscriptions

A Life Subscriber must apply once each year for a rene of the subscription (of course without further pay), over Life Subscriber's own signature, in response to which quest the date will be advanced one year without delay.

This request is necessary to enable us to carry out pledge to send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD weekly during lifetime of the Life Subscriber.

If the request for the annual renewal of a Life Subscr tion is not made promptly each year, the failure to do so sh entail no further loss than such copies as may be missed not requesting the renewal promptly on or before the d printed on the address label. A Life Subscription not renew for two successive years shall be considered as completed.

Life Subscribers are entitled, without pay, to such cal dars and other premiums as may be offered free to ann subscribers. Life Subscribers are entitled to enjoy CHRISTIAN HERALD premium privileges on exactly same basis as regular annual subscribers.

Thus, if a premium is offered, together with THE CHR TIAN HERALD, at $2.00, a Life Subscriber, by sending fi cents, is entitled to such premium. The same rule hol good in regard to magazines offered in combination with T CHRISTIAN HERALD.

For any premium offered with THE CHRISTIAN HERA at $3.00, the Life Subscriber must, of course, send $1.50 the premium.

If more than one premium is desired, the Life Subscri pays for any additional premiums the published rate extra copies just the same as the regular annual subscribe required to pay. In every particular, the Life Subscribe dealt with as though the subscription were renewed annua at the full price. Cordially yours, LOUIS KLOPSCH.

The Final Appeal

If others wish to join our noble company of Life Subscri ers they still have an opportunity. Christmas is coming and no present could be more acceptable to Father, Moth Son or Daughter, Pastor, Sunday School Superintendent Teacher, or to some dear friend, than a Life Subscription THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. While thus making some he inexpressibly happy, you, at the same time, help to bu the Children"s Temple at Mont-Lawn, thus contributing an influence the full beneficent power of which cannot known until a blissful eternity dawns upon our raptur souls.

In order that all may have abundant time for mature co sideration of this proposition, we will not close the off until December 20, 1903, and we hope by that time to ha enrolled the full two thousand. Will your name be amo them? Address your letter "Life Subscription" T CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

In Wildest Africa

ONE of the most thrilling stories of exploration and adventure of modern times is that told by Major Powell-Cotton, who has st returned from a journey of twenty onths in the wildest parts of Africa. He d previously traveled extensively in ashmir and other parts of India, had netrated to the great wall of China, and e frontiers of Thibet, besides making ng tours in Egypt, Arabia and Japan. arting early last year, he reached Mom- sa. With a company of the Swahili be, he turned his steps inland, desiring reach Mount Kenia. On the way he ent a few days in the Kikuyu country, rchasing food and necessaries for his rney. The men there, he says, were ry friendly, though presenting a sav- e appearance. They daub themselves th curious patterns in white clay, d decorate their heads with tufts of rich feathers. The entrance to their lages is through a strong stockade, a low arched passage, that can be eaded only on the hands and knees. making his way to Mumias, he stayed storey huts, the upper storey being reached by a rude ladder, consisting of the trunk of a tree, from which project the remains of branches, which serve as steps. On the march homeward to Gondokoro, the Major had a trying experience in crossing streams where there were no bridges. In some instances only the tallest men could wade across with the burdens. The shorter men were dragged through the water with ropes, and some of them were almost drowned in crossing. The whole journey was full of adventure, and in some of the places the Major visited, no white man had ever been seen before. His chief object, besides exploration, was to hunt elephants, lions, and other large game. As he reports that everywhere ignorance and superstition prevail, it may be hoped that erelong other men will visit those regions, to give the people the glad tidings of salvation. Experience has proved that no people are too degraded to

Panama a Nation

The separation of the State of Panama from Colombia appears now to be an accomplished fact. Being physically separated from it, and still more widely separated by its interests and its grievances, there seems little probability of its being persuaded or coerced into a return to the Colombian union Relying on a treaty with the United States, which was negotiated more than fifty years ago, the new State sees no reason to take measures to defend itself against an attack by Colombia. It expects us to fulfil our obligation to keep the Isthmus open for traffic and the transportation of merchandise, and in order to do so to prevent any hostilities there. President Roosevelt evidently accepts that view of the situation, and orders have been sent to the United States warships, of which there are three at Colon and four at Panama, to prevent the landing of troops on either side of the Isthmus. Instructions were also sent to our consul at Panama to enter into relations with the government as soon as one should be formed that was "without substantial opposition from its own people." This act was followed on November 13, by the formal reception at the White House of Mr. Bunau Varilla, whom the new government of Panama had appointed its Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States. Thus the little Republic was welcomed into the family of independent nations, and its sovereignty recognized by the Power whose friendship and help are most essential to its existence. It is expected that this will be followed by the recognition of France, whose interests are involved in the completion of the canal project, which this separation is expected to achieve. Other nations will probably take the same course, as every one will perceive the advantage to all maritime interests of the construction of the canal. There is no apprehension, thus far, of hostility from any Power except Colombia, and measures are being taken, in the dispatch of United States troops, to ward off danger from that source. It is not known to what extent our Government is prepared to go in protecting the new nation, but it is obvious that if our protection is assured, it need have no fear of any enemy. Its own weakness need not be considered if its protector is mighty. Many a nation, like many an individual, has proved that fact, when it has put its trust in God.

If it had not been the Lord who was on our side . . . then they had swallowed us up quick when their wrath was kindled against us (Ps. 124 : 1, 3).

The Emperor's Illness

No little apprehension has been caused in Germany by the news that it has been found necessary to perform a surgical operation on the throat of the Emperor William. It had been noticed for some days, that his Majesty was becoming very hoarse. His surgeons having examined his throat, said that a polypus had formed on the vocal chords, which must be removed. The operation was performed on November 7, and was pronounced completely successful. The growth has been examined under the microscope, and is declared to have been benignant. It consisted of a very soft web-like membrane The wound is reported to be healing favorably, but as a precaution, the Emperor was ordered to refrain from talking for several days. The illness caused since the operation are of a reassuring character, but the German people cannot forget that the first symptoms of the disease which killed the Emperor's father, Frederick the Noble, were of exactly the same tenor. His mother also died of cancer, so that grave fears are entertained on his account. It is said that he was seriously alarmed, but at present his general health has not been affected. We may be sure that both the Emperor and his physicians, remembering how his father died, will adopt every precautionary measure known to science to save him from the same fate. Men do not act in such matters as they do in moral questions regarding inherited propensities which often find victims in succeeding generations.

Let not your hearts be troubled . . . And the God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly. And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it. Brethren, pray for us. Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss. I charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen. (1 Thess. 5 : 23-28).

A Wild Rush for Land

An extraordinary scene is described in a despatch from Crookston, Minn., to the daily press. It was that of a fierce struggle of excited men and women to obtain part of sixteen acres of land which have been allotted at the Government Office in the Red Lake Indian Reservation. The excitement was more intense than any ever known before in the Northwest, and the number of entries was larger than on any previous day. The prize chosen fell to a girl from Minneapolis, who got a quarter section of valuable agricultural land south of Red Lake, and about sixty miles north of the Great Northern Railroad. She was much envied by her competitors, but she declares she would not undergo the experience again for a claim worth twice the value. She was more saved from fainting. A dressed hare was carried unconscious and lost its claim. Several persons were carried out of the crowd, and scores of others barked out rather than squeeze through. Accounts came in with hats lost, coats torn off and clothes wet with perspiration. One woman fainted, and fell through the door as it opened, and it was several minutes before she could answer the necessary questions. All the men showed signs of the terrific struggle in which they had been engaged. It was very easy to see how to obtain a possession in heaven which God offers freely to all who seek it, and how hard it is to obtain the things which would be destructive.

The Kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force (Matt. 11 : 12).

THANKSGIVING COMFORT

By MARGARET BOTTOME

BE thankful! Why? Be thankful that the Lord is good. Start on this high note on Thanksgiving Day, because all are counted in. I cannot feel as if I had reached the top, till I return thanks for something that is the property of all.

MARGARET BOTTOME

Now some can be thankful that they have plenty of money. Well, it may give them a merry, comfortable feeling; but they would feel still better if they particularly help those who wished they had even a little. No, we must get up higher; and I do not know of a better place to start from than where the Psalmist started: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good."

Do you know what a change it would make in many people if they really believed that? I don't believe many people actually believe that God is good. You say he is (at least a few do), and they say it and all that; but it is a tremendous thing to believe it. Why, it would make such a transformation in people, if they really believed it, that I think it would soon change their circumstances, for faith is a wonderful power.

I was imagining only to-day, Suppose some one who did not know anything at all about God—had only just heard there was a God, but had no idea what he was like—should go to some one they had heard had acquaintance with him, and should say, "I have just heard there is really a God. Can you tell me what he is like?" And if the one to whom this question was put should really know him, that one would say, "Oh, yes, I can tell you what he is like. He is like a mother." "A mother? Do you mean it?" "Yes, I do. It is in a Book that tells about God, and it says that God himself said, 'As a mother comforteth so will I comfort you.'" "Comfort! Comfort me as my mother used to do? Why, I remember if I hurt my little finger she would kiss the place to make it well. Do you mean to tell me God is like that?" "I do. He is just like that; but oh, his love is 'everlasting love,' his arms are 'everlasting arms.' No matter what your hurt may be, he will kiss your spirit and whisper, 'It will not be long, my child. Your earthly home may not be what you wished; but the Father's house is not far off. You are coming to the place where there are no more tears, neither sorrow nor sighing.' Isn't this kissing the place to make it well?"

No one knows better than I do, what it is to miss the loved ones on Thanksgiving Day. There are no Thanksgiving dinners for many people at this time. In some cases, nearly all the family are on the other side. But don't forget that the whole family are to meet again soon, and don't forget, either, that they will not be perfectly satisfied till we all get there. I am so glad they miss us. We, maybe, have thought "how we miss them," but we have done them injustice by thinking that their surroundings were so wonderful that they would not think of us. Would that be like them? They are just the same.

Some Christians must look out, or they will not have a Thanksgiving day "within" them, and it is the "within" that tells. The trouble is, with many of us, we do not know God as He is. Maybe from our very childhood we have had wrong thoughts about God. An error in the mind is a very serious thing. Maybe our mothers told us, if we were good, God would love us, leaving the error in the mind that if we were bad, he would not love us. Ah me! I thought so once, and it stayed and grew with me. I would say, "if I was very good, God would love me; but I am not good, and so he cannot love me." I believed a lie! Did you ever s a mother who did not love her bad bo If she did not, she was not a real moth —a good mother.

I received a letter yesterday from friend of mine who has an only child, beautiful little girl. She saw that child b hind a runaway horse; she saw the coac man unable to hold the animal, and one was in the carriage but this only chil She wrote me that in that moment, the first time, she knew something of t agony of God for his runaway childre I read sometime ago that God's love for all is so great, that he holds each one of as if we were the only child he had. H only child. Think of it! Ah, my frien maybe you are a runaway, and mayb you think God doesn't care. Did not th mother call for her child who was behi that runaway horse? And can an earth mother care, and the God that made mother-love not care? It is not true th He doesn't care. It's a libel on God.

I have a memory of a boy that h gone astray, and his father was so indi nant that he said, "I will not have him the house. I will send him to sea." A I can see a little mother put her litt hand on the arm of that father, and in low voice, with unutterable pain in it, sa "Don't send him away, father." God as a mother.

HEROES OF FAITH*

The Faith Required by the Gospel Active from the Beginning of History

FAITH is the keynote by which the heroes of Old Testament times are grouped together by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. His object appears to have been to show that although the old dispensation had been superseded by the new, the same principles survived. The Hebrew, in accepting Christianity, gained a better temple, a better priest, a permanent sacrifice not needing to be repeated, and a complete possession of all that was symbolized in his former system.

How close was the connection, the writer shows by this list of heroes. The faith by which the Christian obtains the blessing was not a new principle. The men whom the Jews most venerated were animated, sustained and guided by the same principle. Abel showed his faith by the character of his sacrifice; Enoch could not have walked with God without faith; Noah would not have built the ark if he had not trusted in God's assurance; Abram proved his faith by leaving home and family and going out into a strange land, and later by his obedience to the command to offer his son; the lives of Jacob and Joseph are inexplicable without the recognition of their faith. Lastly, Moses, himself, the lawgiver and leader, was a conspicuous example of the cardinal principle of the new religion. Would he, the writer asks in effect, have given up his high position in the royal favor and have cast in his lot with the people of God, if he had not had strong faith? Thus the faith that the convert from Judaism was invited to exercise, was the identical principle which had been the basis of the characters he had been accustomed to hold in highest esteem.

The Christian more readily perceives the drift of the argument than did the Jew. The lives of these heroes are examples of the effect of faith. To believe in God, to be sure that all he promises he will surely perform, to be so certain that God is, and that his word cannot fail, inspires men with dauntless courage, gives them power to resist all evil, and even sustains them in martyrdom. This faith by which men are saved is the foundation of heroism.

A Thanksgiving Song

I.

A LITTLE sparrow, on its branch,
One chill November day,
Upraised its little feathered head,
And sang its feeble lay.
The cold breeze roughed its dingy coat;
The branch was bare and gray;
Chill winds had damped its cheery home,
Now moldering in decay;
Yet it tried to sing its thanks to God
With praise, in its feeble way.

II.

A little, thoughtless, wind-tossed child
Came trudging by that way,
And stopped to listen to the bird,
As it sang, that chilly day.
And a winsome smile broke o'er her face,
Sweet as a sunbeam's ray.
She caught the spirit of the song,
And raised her eyes of blue,
And in her tender little way
She tried to thank God, too.

III.

A widow, heavy-hearted, sad,
With step both tired and slow,
Paused as she passed, her drooping head
With sorrow bending low.
She saw the little ruffled bird
That sang upon the spray,
And, lifting up her eyes to heaven,
She softly tried to pray.

IV.

We, like the sparrow, may do good,
E'en in a humble way;
What, though the chill rains sometimes fall
And clouds o'ercast the day?
The sun will soon shine forth again,
With many a pleasant ray;
Then Let us thank God all we can,
And do good while we may.

V.

With thankful heart and cheerful hand
Let's sing upon our way;
And let our thoughts e'er heavenward rise
To seek His guide and stay.
A lesson well we all may learn
From little things each day,
From a humble sparrow's song
Upon a leafless spray.

POWER TO OVERCOME*

Humanity Lost and Helpless Without the Guidance and Strength of Christ

LIFE, and more abundant life, is th promise Jesus makes to all wh come to him in faith. This, abov all things, is the need of humanity We need to know, but more than tha we need the power to act on what w know. All the symbols that Christ used t indicate our condition, point to two chara teristics: bewilderment and weakness. H is the remedy for both. He offers hin self as our guide and our invigorator.

Our own experience affords ampl proof of our inacapacity to attain spiritua ascendency without him. No man wh has tried to gain control over his ow propensities, to keep the animal natur within him from usurping authority ove the spiritual nature, is ignorant of his ow need of divine help. The poor drunkar who resolves to be sober, who knows tha his health and moral character and hi very life are imperilled by his yielding t his desire for intoxicating liquor, yet wh in spite of resolutions, falls again and agai under its power, is only a type of me who have to battle with other temptations We cannot do the things that we would The lower nature is so strong, so insistent so imperious, that reluctantly we yiel obedience to it. Even with men so happil constituted, through the blessing of here dity, that the enemy is weak, other lure exercise a power that involves struggle The love of fame, of power, of riche draws them aside, and prevents thei reaching the ideals of their youth. On of the most prominent philosophers of thi generation, confessed that dearly as he prized his freedom, he would willingly become a human machine to be wound up and regulated like a clock, if only in tha way he could be assured of always think ing right and doing right.

To a man thus helpless, thus incapable of maintaining the higher order of his being, Christ offers divine power. In some way—how we know not—he imparts to us his strength. The spiritual nature finds in him an omnipotent ally. As he struggles, he receives the hidden manna, which enables him to overcome. It is life, the real spiritual life which he gives, and in that strength the weakest may triumph.

SANTO DOMINGO AGAIN IN REVOLUTION

ULYSSES HEUREAUX called himself "El Pacificador de la Patria," and clung to the presidential chair of the Republic of Santo Domingo, through sheer cruelty and deceit, for thirteen years. He was assassinated at Mocha on July 26, 1899, and since that time the Republic of Santo Domingo has been, without intermission, the theatre of vile conspiracies and sanguinary fights. Within the last few years, in rapid succession, Jimenez was ousted, through treachery, by Vasquez, Vasquez by W. Y. Gil, and now Gil is on the point of being ousted by Morales, in the interest of Jimenez.

Revolutions are nothing new in the Spanish republic, but the present trouble becomes highly interesting, because the active interference of foreign powers—the United States and Germany thus far—stamps it as an international event. Men-of-war of both nations have actively interfered for the protection of their commercial interests and the lives of their citizens. Diplomatic relations between the United States and Santo Domingo have been very rigid for some time past, because a great number of American claims have remained unsettled for an extended period. The pending litigations are mostly of a material character. Among the most important ones stands the claim of the Santo Domingo Improvement Company of New York. This company acquired, in 1893, the rights and concessions of the firm of Westendorp & Co., of Amsterdam and New York, to which the Government of Santo Domingo had made over all the custom receipts of the country against various loans. This contract was cancelled by the Republic and monthly payments substituted; but these payments have not been made, and now the company demands $4,500,000, and asks that other claims should be adjusted by arbitration.

There is also a claim by the Clyde Line, founded on certain losses occasioned by the change of the harbor regulations in Santo Domingo. Formerly, all vessels coming from foreign harbors had to pay tonnage dues, except the steamers of the Clyde Line. The change consisted of the cancellation of the tonnage dues, and now the Clyde Line declares it has sustained a serious loss through competition. Another serious claim is that of Sala, a Frenchman, who had formerly furnished to President Heureaux money and ammunition to the extent of $215,000. Sala is now dead, and his claim has been inherited by his widow, an American lady. Furthermore, Mr. Salvador Ross, an American citizen, claims, through the State Department, a considerable amount of money from Santo Domingo for various public improvements, which the Government of that Republic refused to accept, although the country has benefited by them since 1900.

These are the principal material claims, which are in litigation between the United States and Santo Domingo. The negotiations were very tedious. Each new government in the Island Republic raised new difficulties; but finally the American Minister, Mr. Powell, succeeded in arranging for the payment of certain claims, and secured the consent of the Dominican government to have other claims submitted to arbitration.

Then the Government of Santo Domingo submitted to the Congress of the Republic, a project to declare neutral certain harbors and to create certain free harbors. At the same time the possibility was discussed of ceding or leasing some Dominican territory to an European power. The United States, of course, protested in the most energetic way. Consequently the questionable project fell through, but the relations remained unimproved and are yet "icy." To-day Santo Domingo is somewhat apprehensive of some act of precipitation by the United States, notwithstanding the declaration of our minister, Mr. Powell, in November, 1902, that neither President Roosevelt nor the United States intended to "approach" the autonomy of the little Republic.

The present revolution in Santo Domingo is a direct consequence of the faithless way in which President Gil has handled the finances of the country, giving every possible advantage to certain people to the detriment of the treasury and the inhabitants. Should the revolution win, it will be Jimenez's interest not to accept the presidency. He will probably favor Thomas Ureña, a man of sixty years, with great experience in public affairs. The head of the revolutionary movement, General Carlos Morales will also receive an important place. Jimenez himself might return to the country as Executive agent of Santo Domingo—a position he occupied after he had recognized Gil's impracticable policies. If certain guarantees on shore, for instance, of a lease of the Bay of Samana, should be offered, the speedy adjustment of the finances of the Republic would be possible here.

ENTRANCE TO THE BARRACKS, SAN DOMINGO CITY

Cable dispatches from Santo Domingo state, that in the middle of November the revolution was in full swing. The insurgent forces had several times both attacked the capital, with shells and small arms, but had been repulsed. The city government rejected the repeated demand for surrender. Comparatively little damage was done by the shelling, although there was loss of life in some of the assaults by the insurgents, which involved fighting at close quarters. The foreign representatives were notified by the insurgents before the shelling, but declined to accept the warning to leave. Most of the insurgent shells failed to explode. Several sorties were attempted by the government forces, but were ineffective. There were repeated rumors of the city's capitulation and of the proclamation of General Jimenez as President, but these reports lacked confirmation.

The revolutionists addressed a letter to United States Minister Powell, informing him that engagements entered into with the United States by the government presided over by General Wos y Gil would not be recognized by them. The letter requested that Minister Powell recognize the revolutionists, but the Minister refused to hold communication with them.

An unconfirmed dispatch received in Paris from Cape Haytien reported that after three days' fighting President Wos y Gil took refuge in the German Consulate in Santo Domingo.

The ports of Monte Puerto Plata, Sanchez and Samana have been under blockade. Germany has two warships, Panther and Gazelle, in Dominican waters, to protect German interests. The gunboat went into the inner harbor of Monte Cristi, and Santo Domingo City to look after American interests. There has been some fear existing as to the treatment of the insurgents and Dominican troops, but without decisive result.

DAVID'S SONS IN CONTRAST

SOLOMON'S WISE CHOICE

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR DECEMBER 6. I. KINGS 3: 4-15

...By...
Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT:
"THE FEAR OF THE LORD IS THE BEGINNING OF WISDOM"
PROVERBS 9: 10

"SO SOLOMON BUILT THE HOUSE AND FINISHED IT"

THE wisdom of Solomon's choice may be seen by setting it in contrast with Absalom's wicked and foolish choice in our previous lesson. When Solomon was a child of five years, his brother Absalom murdered an elder brother, because he stood between him and the throne of his father, pretending he was only revenging a sister's wrong. Then he plotted treasonably to add to his crimes the death or dethroning of his father in order to wear the crown himself. To accomplish this he played the part of a lying politician and a religious hypocrite (II. Sam. 15: 1-12). He even went to battle against his own father, only to find in place of giory, death and infamy, his monument being subsequently heaped with stones thrown in scorn by every passer-by. He chose to get wealth and honor by infamous means, and lost everything for both worlds, as most men do who seek honor by dishonorable means.

Let us turn now to Absalom's brother, Solomon, who got power and wealth and kept them long, not by directly seeking them, but by seeking wisdom from God, to which all really good things are always added.

David being old and about to die, God had told him that he had chosen from among his many sons not the eldest but the wisest, Solomon, to be his successor. David had made his solemn farewell charge to the people and to Solomon, at a great national assembly of princes and captains and officers. Solomon, in the spirit of Kipling's "Recessional," to which we have had repeated occasion to refer, went from that inaugural scene of pomp to the place of prayer, the Tabernacle at Gibeon, and there God came to him in a dream, and bade the young prince choose what he would have from God. He was but nineteen, and if he had been like most young men would have chosen a round of sport, with money and power as means of self-indulgence. But he showed he was already wise beyond his years—his going to the place of prayer in that great hour of need had already shown that—by asking wisdom to govern wisely his great kingdom. He was, no doubt, well educated in the learning of the schools, and became the most learned man of his time, but he knew that learning and wisdom were very different things. As Tennyson says:

Learning comes, but wisdom lingers.

Learning can be had from books, but "if any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God." So Solomon thought, and so he prayed. God gave him not only wisdom above any man of his age, as his Proverbs show, but also riches unequalled up to that time, so that silver was as stones in the streets of Jerusalem, and God gave him also the greatest kingdom of his time, the Land of Promise becoming under his wisely peaceful sway for the first time the land possessed. He illustrates the promise: Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and all other good things shall be added.

Illustration and Application

God came in a dream to Joseph as a boy of seventeen, picturing his future glory as a righteous ruler by a full-orbed sun, to which the moon and stars, representing his father and brothers, made obeisance. And the New Testament Joseph was sent by a dream to Egypt, bearing a greater Prince. The wise men, too, were guided by a dream to disregard Herod's plotting request, and go back from the cradle of the Christ King by another route. And God spoke by a dream to Gideon of his coming victory over the Midianites, and to Daniel of Christ's conquest of the world. To Paul, in his hours of persecution, Christ came in visions, and lifted him for strength to the very heavens. Nor should we forget how God spoke to the child Samuel at night, not in a dream, but awakening him to duty. But dreams, like miracles, are no longer needed as revelations of God's will, since we have the more sure Word in our complete Bible. It is foolish to be led by dreams to-day, which are chiefly the work of disordered stomachs and nerves out of joint, "To the law and to the testimony."

THE RUINS OF ANCIENT GIBEON, THE SCENE OF SOLOMON'S VISION

Material things have no power of choice, especially in the mineral kingdom and the vegetable kingdom. The stone split by the frost from the mountain side has no choice whether it will fall or fly. It must go down, even though it crush a cottage and little children in its path. We do not blame the rock, for it had no choice. The mountain stream is not censured for taking a harmful rather than a helpful course, for it must follow the line of least resistance and obey the law of gravity. The thorn is not blamed for being a thorn instead of a fruitful vine. The poison plant has no sense of guilt in itself, and awakens no censure in us, for it has no choice and so no responsibility. Even the wolf we do not blame for being wolfish, nor the butcher bird for slaughtering its weaker neighbors. There does seem to be some sense of guilt in some domestic animals, which may be only a fear of punishment. A dog who has relapsed into wolfish habits by killing sheep, or a cat who has eaten the canary, looks guilty, or at least afraid; but we do not seriously blame even these animals for acting according to nature. But when a man, endowed with the power of choice, and having in his mind what Daniel Webster called the greatest thought that ever passed through a human brain, the sense of his individual responsibility to God—when such a creature is as heartless in evil doing as a stone; as prone to find the line of least resistance and go downward to his own harm and the ruin of others as a stream; when he makes himself like a thorn instead of a cluster of fruit; when he acts like a beast, though created as a man, then we blame him, and he blames himself, with an instinctive judgment, which no modern theories attributing crime to heredity and the measure of the bones can wholly silence, albeit all such attempts to belittle the sense of responsibility, furnish harmful excuses for knaves to use with fools at a time when justice is too much smothered with bouquets for criminals.

What is it Like in Nature?

Has God ever said to any boy of our time, "Ask what I shall give thee?" Certainly not in any such direct way as he did to the young King of Israel. And yet there is a very deep sense in which God makes this same offer to all men. More really than we think, are our own destinies in our own hands. As illustrating this, even in temporal affairs, a man when he was young had $600 saved up. A lot in New York was offered him for just that sum of money. At that time, however, he was living a somewhat fast life, and took great pleasure in buggy riding. So he decided not to buy but to spend his money having a "good time." Five years ago that same lot sold for nearly $1,000,000. At that same time that same man was being helped to pay his rent in a tenement house. Now, is it not true that, at the time the lot was offered him God really gave him his choice between a wise and a foolish use of his money? There were no difficulties in the case; for any one would say that it was wiser to invest in real estate than in horseflesh. So there are to-day thousands of young men to whom God silently offers a large range of choices. Many are living in our Sunday Schools who might be rich some day, or well educated some day, if they really chose. A right use of their present facilities (money, time, talent) would give them large returns. Yet these same young folk are destined to be neither rich nor wise in their latter end. The young man prefers to spend his money in the pool-room; that money which, saved, might some day turn the scale of his fortune. The young girl prefers to waste her time in frivolous amusements; that time, whose right employment would go far to secure her an education. These things are stubborn facts, which any one of experience can corroborate out of his own observation. More largely than we think does God give us the same offer that was made to Solomon, "Ask what I shall give thee."

What is it Like in Common Life?

When school days are over—often too early in youth, because commercialism has invaded even childhood, and many a child is allowed to turn aside from school to money making when there is no need of it—choosing an occupation becomes a serious business, on which health and happiness and holiness very largely depend. Let boys be taught that it is a great wrong to God and their own bodies and souls to choose any occupation that requires work on Sunday other than works of great necessity and mercy. And when even such work will cut one off from the fountains of noble character, the church service and Sabbath School, a boy had better take something else even at less wages, since character is more than property. Ruskin wisely charges his workmen friends to refuse to engage in making anything shameful at any price. One ought not to be content, except in temporary emergencies, to make anything that is not of real service to the world. We revolt at the idea of putting even prisoners at unproductive labor, turning grindstones or breaking stones, when nothing is to come of it. How much worse for a free man to work in making anything harmful or even useless. A man should choose a work in which he feels he is ministering to the world's need no less, though in a different way, than the preacher. Choosing a residence should also be a conscientious act. Only when missionary work calls for it should one "pitch his tent at Sodom," lest Lot's fate may come to him in character. Choosing a chum or partner, most of all choosing a wife or husband, should be a serious act, settled, like Solomon's choice, at the place of prayer.

How many choose to "make money" as a means of pleasure or honor or usefulness, only to find they have chosen a master instead of a servant, and misery in miserliness, in place of joy in usefulness!

A story is told of an English minister, who, being called to pray by the bedside of a dying man, sought to take him by the hand, in token of their agreement in offering united prayer. The sick man withheld his hand, keeping it under the bedclothes, and the minister prayed without it. Presently the man died, and then as his hand was uncovered the mystery was explained—he was holding in his hand, with the grasp of death, a key—the key of the safe where his money was kept. The Lewiston Journal tells of a similar case in Durham, Maine, a man who on his deathbed kept his right hand closely clutched. As he drew his last breath he tightened his hold. Everbody knew what he held in that hand. It was the key to the chest in which he kept his gold. As his nerveless hands unclosed, the key dropped from them, and clattered against the bedside. As if to hold it even after he was dead, the miser had tied the key about his wrist by a strong cord. They buried him with the key to his money chest tied about his wrist. "And what became of the gold?" "Oh, the heirs have taken care of that just the same! They split open the chest with an ax and divided the gold, and let the miser keep the key."

A THANKSGIVING STORY

THE CABIN ON THE HILL

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"THAT'S JEST LIKE A WOMAN, EVADIN' THE P'INT"

"IT'S no use talkin' about it, Hannah Jane. Them women's got to come to it some time, an' it might's well be fust ez last. The taown'll hev 'em sick on its hands, if they stay up on Beech Hill this winter. It might better hev 'em well before winter comes."

The farmer set his square jaw and looked sternly at the little woman who was watching the progress of a boiled dinner that gave out a goodly smell, savory and tempting.

She answered irrelevantly.

"Couldn't you hitch up this afternoon, father, and take the Paisley girls some of our dinner. There'll be plenty left."

"Hannah Jane," said her old husband, shaking his grizzled head. "That's jest like a woman, evadin' the p'int. Yes, I'll carry them some dinner, sooner'n hev it go to waste. You pervide too much, Hannah Jane."

The wee cabin high up on the bleak hillside was a cheerless place, but it was very dear to Mary and Susie Paisley, for it was their home. They did not mind being cold there, or hungry there, so long as they were independent there. Until recently, they had made enough money for their simple wants by sewing and doing odd jobs to assist the frugal housekeepers in Essex, but Miss Mary's eyes had given out, and she could not sew, and Miss Susie had a lame knee, owing to a fall. And so it had come to pass, that here and there about the township there were hints and whispers that the Paisley girls would soon have to go to the poorhouse.

Fortunately, these hints had not yet reached their ears. They would scarcely have believed it had they known that Obadiah Jessop, and Hiram Van Duyer, and Otis Beardslee, and Zekiel Pitts were discussing the question whether or not two ladies, rather helpless, ought to be allowed to live in want in their own house, when the town had a comfortable free hotel, of a sort, to offer them.

Hannah Jane Pitts, Zekiel's wife, had heard the men talk, and had made up her mind to prevent an action that would break the hearts of her two proud old friends. But she was a wise woman, and did not provoke opposition. Instead, she made Ezekiel her messenger, with a well-filled basket, in which the "biled dish" was only one of several appetizing and useful articles. When he reached the cabin, he carried in her basket, saying gruffly:

"Good afternoon, girls. My wife's sent ye up some of her cookin'. She thought ye might enjoy it. Seein's I'm here, I'll bring in your wood for you an' fix ye up a bit."

The Paisley girls were almost seventy, but the neighbors would call them girls to the end of their lives.

Meanwhile Hannah Jane put on bonnet and cloak and went out to make calls. She had an errand at each house, that she attended to at once. Then, incidentally, she managed to leave a seed which should flower bye and bye in a kind deed for Mary and Susie Paisley. By the time she reached home, the Beardslees were determining that they would see that the old ladies had some Thanksgiving, the Jessops had decided to have their expelled with sausages and buckwheats, and the Van Duyers had pondered themselves to turkey and fowl. All was to be done incognito. "It wouldn't seem so," said Mrs. Pitts, "to let them know that they were objects of charity."

On her part, she had planned out so many good dishes a week for them, and had discovered that she was in the greatest need of having carpet rags attended to together. It took so very little cyanight for carpet rags.

When Obadiah Jessop ventures to suggest the almshouse to his wife as the Paisley girls' proper refuge she turned on him suddenly that he never did the same.

"I'm ashamed of you, Obadiah. Such a thing was never heard of. The Paisleys went to school with me."

Mrs. Jessop said "Me" as if she were a reigning sovereign, as indeed she was.

When Thanksgiving arrived, the good matrons were divided in opinion as to whether the Paisleys would most enjoy having dinner at home, or being treated out. From a chance word dropped by Mary, the consensus of opinion was that they would prefer the former. So Mrs. Pitts sent a turkey, done to a turn, and Mrs. Jessop provided a mince pie, and other friends added to the feast, and Mrs. Beardslee, coming in at dusk the night before, slipped a crisp five-dollar bill into Susie's hand.

"There was a psalm, Mary," said Susie, "we used to say when we were little:

My table Thou hast furnished
In presence of my foes.
My head Thou dost with oil anoint,
And my cup overflows.

"Yes; it does," answered Mary. "I'll confess to you, Susie, that early in the season I began to be very distressful of the dear Lord. I did not see how we were to be taken care of. But the Lord has been wonderful."

"So have been our friends."

"Yes, they have been his angels."

The two old women, sitting by their crackling stove, where there was plenty of wood burning briskly, sang together in their quavering voices:

Here I'll raise my Ebenezer
Hither by Thy help I've come,
And I hope by Thy good pleasure
Safely to arrive at home.

So slipped away their happy Thanksgiving. And the whole township was gladder in their gladness.

Traveling Mercies

"GRANT these friends traveling mercies," was the petition offered by a host at morning prayers, when guests were leaving to take a long journey. The words lingered like music all the day, while the travelers sped swiftly by hillside and riverbank, to their destination.

What are traveling mercies? Safety is one, of course. Perils of many kinds beset our rapid wayfaring, hurried along by steam and electricity, and depending as we do on the fidelity and skill of the average man. The conductor and engineer may be most competent and careful, but a bridge may break, a train jump the rails, a fog obscure the signals. Safety is, indeed, a mercy prized by travelers.

Comfort is another. How the old hardships have vanished, and in what ease and luxury we flit from point to point, across great continents. Freedom from illness is a third. When one steps from a train or a steamer, alert, fresh, buoyant, is not that a cause for gratitude?

Pleasant happenings by the way count up in the column where we foot the sum of our mercies. And when we think about it, the total of our traveling mercies is very great, whether we take the road for a long stretch, or simply go to and fro, between home and office, about our usual business.

A Pattern Worth Copying

A lady the other day was speaking of Jewish family life. She said, "Our Hebrew neighbors teach their young children and their boys and girls to be considerate of their elders and very deferential to their parents and the aged. They pay great attention to the infirm and are kind to the poor, and they remember the scriptural injunction, "thou shalt rise up at the hoary head."

Might not Christians with profit, imitate the copy set them by their Hebrew friends, so far as reverence is concerned, for the old and for those in positions of authority?

A Prayer of the Early Church

"Almighty and everlasting God, who, in the abundance of thy goodness, dost exceed the deserts as well as the desires of thy suppliants, pour forth upon us thy mercy, that thou mayest forgive those things whereof our conscience is afraid, and add unto us those things which our prayer dareth not to ask, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

A THANKSGIVING PASTORAL

THERE'S never a leaf on the tree, Love, the boughs wave naked aloft,
There's only dry stubble and brown, Love, in the bleak and wintry croft,
But the sky is as blue above us, as ever the sky in June,
And the song in our heart is as quick to start, and it trips to the summer's tune.

The corn is all in the bin, Love, the beasts are safe in the byre,
The children sleep in their beds, Love, and you are my soul's desire,
And the flames leap up on the hearthstone, the house is snug and warm,
And the world's outside, and we twain abide, close hid from the coming storm.

What boot that the wild winds blow, Love, what boots that the chill winds blow,
Who cares that the dead leaves toss, Love, in the dust-clouds to and fro?
There is snow in the hand of the mother, the mother who folds us all;
Let her drop its peace like a white wool fleece, wherever the snowflakes fall.

Ah, summer is good in its time, Love, and God send summer again,
And autumn is good in its prime, Love, and the silver slant of the rain.
But we lift to God above us our thankful eyes and say,
While we stay together, let hap what weather, 'twill ever be God's best day.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Don't be Worried By Trifles

WHEN you think of it, the things that worry you, and make you lose your temper, are absurdly trifling, are they not? Somebody tracks mud on the clean wetwash on the kitchen floor. It is annoying, but to remove the spots by a mop or a damp cloth will be easier than hard scolding and lose less time. Somebody is late at breakfast. Why fuss and fret about that? Just pass it over pleasantly and trust that it won't happen again. Somebody drops a cup and saucer and the cherished objects are turned to kindling wood. Broken china. Well, grown people who tell children that they must not grieve over little disappointments, how be ashamed over fractured toys, are childishly sorry themselves when one pairs go wrong. In the great crises we are calm and composed, bearing the pain or the trouble with magnificent courage, victorious from the battle that was against us, but the petty brush with the enemy puts our self-control to proof and makes us retire in confusion. Ah, remember to the Lord always come to worry. "Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication make your requests known unto God."

Serviceable Hints

Before starting on an extended trip—to California for instance—make a bag of paper, inscribe it with name of destination, and run tape through the top. Put your hat in here in this and it can swing from the lower hooks at the side of the car near the top. This will dispense of the hat, and it will be free from dust and the possibility of being crushed by the articles on the seats.

It can be interesting on a shopping tour and have your check-ers at the foot of the bath of sugar, a piece of hominy, a yard and a half long, will be found very useful to secure your articles that can be folded. This will prevent the dust, which will settle on them when the windows are raised.

When a number of women agree to be together for a week-end or weeks or holidays at your own home. Have with you a dark Kimono or black dressing gown and soft bed shoes, and wear them all night and put your clothes on comfortably in the morning.

Make a basket of all household things which will conveniently go into it, and have one of any one which will conveniently go into it, and have one of any one which will conveniently go into it, and have one of any one

by Mary Sargent Hopkins.

ALREADY a note is in the air, telling of the Thanksgiving dinner to be given at the Bowery Mission, for the men who tramp that famous thoroughfare. Here, for many years, these homeless and hungry men have been bidden to a feast such as many of them have never seen before, much less enjoyed. Turkey and all the "fixings," hot coffee, fruit, and big slices of bread in abundance, serve to fill empty stomachs, while words of cheer from the good men and women who have their hearts in this mission work, fall like dew upon the parched hearts before them.

55 Bowery! How much those words mean to hundreds and thousands of men, was demonstrated to me one Sunday in the Thanksgiving season, when I spent the whole day and evening at the Mission. Arriving at 10.30 A.M., I found a great crowd of men of all ages and many nationalities, waiting for the doors to be opened. Putting aside the desire to linger and study the crowd a bit, I asked a passing policeman if he would kindly tell me how to gain an entrance to the Mission, thinking, perhaps, there might be a side door through which I could pass in advance of the waiting throng. A word, and the crowd made way, a tap, and the door opened; I slipped in, and my day at the Bowery Mission had begun.

A pleasant-faced man told me of a meeting in progress in the kitchen. Passing down the broad aisle, glancing as I went at the very judicious admixture of hymn-books and coffee cups which lay upon the seats, and were stowed in the corners thereof, and by the beautiful organ, occupying nearly the whole width of the hall, I found myself in a narrow passage leading to the kitchen. Here a prayer-meeting was just coming to a close. Only a handful of men were there; but they seemed earnest and happy, each one testifying to the uplift and help that he had found at this Mission.

A tall, broad-shouldered, genial-faced man entered just as the meeting was closing, and said a few words—a very few words; his clothing was of better quality than was that of the other men, and his coat fitted his fine proportions with greater nicety; his voice and accent proclaimed the educated man; but so humble and unassuming was his manner, so brotherly was the concern and interest shown, so convincingly did he speak of what the good Lord had done for him, and would do for all who trusted him, that I may be pardoned for a little start of surprise when, at the meeting's close, the speaker was introduced as Mr. John Hallimond, Superintendent of the Mission, a man who, from his youth up, has spent his strength and substance in laboring for the salvation of his fellowmen.

In the few moments before the meeting began in the hall, Mr. Hallimond told in the most interesting manner, with his heart in the telling, so many things, that I scarcely know where to begin my story, and, having begun, know still less where to stop.

"You must see Mother Bird," he said. I must meet the quartette, and be introduced to the organist, whose advent into Christian life and work was so like the story of The Volunteer Organist, that he might have been the original of that pathetic tale. In that ten-minute talk with John Hallimond, the tragedy, the pitiful waste of years, in a dozen different lives was told, years now buried in the dead past, never to be revived, only as a warning memory. Out from the darkness of degradation which waits upon dissolute lives, these men had emerged, to walk on the King's Highway; and the first ray which had shown the way to paths of uprightness and peace, had beamed forth from the Bowery Mission.

As these men were introduced, they, one by one, gave me a cordial hand-grasp. I saw in their faces that indefinable something which speaks of the soul of music within—a saving grace; for it does not seem as if its possessor could ever be wholly lost to good. Life may be jangled and out of tune, but in the discord of sin and its inevitable results, there is an undertone of heaven-born melody, needing but the touch of the Master's hand to produce the harmony which pervades the lives of those at peace with their Maker, who strives not only for their own salvation, but reaches out a helping hand to those who are mistakingly swelling Satan's ribald chorus.

"BIG CUPS OF HOT COFFEE AND THICK SANDWICHES"

After the kitchen prayer-meeting came the morning service in the big hall. Here, on a platform facing hundreds of men, I sat with dear Mrs. Bird, who is known as the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," and who conducted the meeting. The one dominant note was love, heard through prayer; reading of the Scriptures, singing, preaching; no—talking, for John Hallimond does not preach; he speaks straight from his heart. I was impressed as never before with the common-sense of religion, and the advantages of a godly life over that led by those who say in their hearts, "there is no God," and go on their way, transgressing every law of nature and their God-given knowledge of good and evil, until, in suffering, disease and death, they are paid the wages they have earned.

There they sat, hundreds of them, these men of the Bowery, a story written on each face; many telling of a tragic ending not so very far off, unless a helping hand was stretched forth to save.

As the speaker told of what even the most hopeless man before him could claim as his own, if he would but accept—if he would but forsake his ways and give the Lord a chance to bless him—the light of a faint hope seemed to dawn upon some of the countenances before me. Men's faces, sodden and brutalized by drink and every imaginable degradation, are not to be made to shine in an hour; but as the wee spark kindles the flame, so this glimmer of hope may expand, until by its light the good is found.

The speaker dwelt not upon the consequences of crime, and the dark and devious ways in which it leads its victims. The men before him knew these things only too well. These men were not all "Hoboes," "Bowery bums," "Panhandlers," or "Tramps." What little self-respect might be left in their breasts was not crushed by any "Stand aside, I am holier than thou" methods; but they were spoken to as brothers, unfortunate, sick, sore and hungry; for diseases was offered the healing of the great Physician, and for their soul-hunger, the bread of life.

Just here comes in the practical part of the Bowery Mission. A hungry man cannot be expected to listen very patiently to religious teaching or to advice, be it ever so good; he wants something to eat, and he gets it here—a big cup of hot coffee and a sandwich, so thick that a Bowery "barker" could hardly open his jaws wide enough to accommodate it, until the slices were separated. How many come just for the coffee and sandwich, it would be hard to tell; but that a world of good has been done by this Mission and a multitude of men saved from destruction is a matter of simple fact. How much the hot coffee may have to do with the preliminary work of salvation among these poor wayfarers, it matters not, so that they are comforted sufficiently to even think one straight, wholesome thought.

The rule of governing these meetings, confining the audience to men, precluded my watching the speaker's face; but even his back was eloquent, and as he stepped from the platform down among the men, every eye was fastened upon him. More than one weary, sin-sick soul carried away the message of love this good man gave, pleading with them to brace up and pray to God to help them to leave all this woe and sin behind, and be at peace.

"O men! Won't you accept? Won't you accept?" and the words were freighted with pity and yearning. Then followed a short prayer, and many a head was bowed, some almost unconsciously; stiffnecked and hardened old men, and hollow-eyed, sneering youths, old in everything but years and goodness, were touched by this honest interest in them. The meeting, and also the evening service, was marked by an utter absence of that emotional disturbance too often mistaken for religious conviction, and which is so evanescent that it hardly lasts a man until he reaches the sidewalk. Perfect quiet reigned throughout the meeting; close and respectful attention was given to all the exercises; there was no shouting in frenzy, no groanings over sin-weighted spirits; no hallelujahs over sinners saved, but an intensity of earnestness and sincerity permeated the whole assembly.

The "testimonies" given by those who had been saved by the Mission's help being extended to them when they had not a friend upon earth, must have made a deep impression upon the men to whom they were talking. The members of the quartette and others told their stories, differing only in detail. They were drunken and miserable, forsaken by their friends, who stuck by them while a penny was left to treat with, but dropped them when all was spent. Reduced to the last extremity, sick, hungry and cold, they had wandered up and down the Bowery. Discouraged, defiant and hard of heart, they had drifted into the Mission. These men stood up and told their stories so simply that their words carried conviction; yet one could not help a feeling of wonder, for some of them showed in voice, manner and general bearing that they were not strangers to the refinements of life. Could it be possible that these have been "Men of the Bowery," men shivering with cold, half dead from dissipation and exposure, hungry, penniless and friendless; men who by mad persistence in their downward career, had worn out the patience of those who had helped them to their feet, again and again. Is it possible these men are telling their own stories? Yes, but only the merest outline, and in the fewest words, for they are not proud of their past nor fond of exploiting it; but they want others to find help where they found over that assemblage. Many of the men had faces showing as good traits and as much intelligence as one meets with in every-day life. Many had fallen from the "high estate" of good family, fine education and position in society, through drink, who in time may regain all that they have thrown away.

In supporting this Mission, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing a mighty work, the ramifications of which will only be known on the hereafter. The men of the Bowery are worth saving. The men in that crowd, which I spent so many hours studying and hoping for, are worth saving; and they will be saved to themselves, to their families, to the world, and their future is secure in Him in whom they put their trust.

All praise to the Bowery Mission! May its supporters grow rich in happy contemplation of the good they have been inspired to do, and may those who wish to work for the good of suffering humanity, withhold it, the chance to lead respectable lives where they found it, the hope that made them alive again where they found it, and the peace that passeth all understanding where they found it. So they tell their sad experience, which, as one of them said, "had left scars never to be effaced, and of which he was ashamed."

The joy in Heaven over one sinner repenting must be augmented many fold by the work of the Bowery Mission, for not only are many brought to repentance, but they are helped to lead decent, honest lives. Employment is found for those who cannot find it for themselves, and they are assisted in many ways, beginning with the coffee and the sandwich.

There was much to hearten one, in looking not their hand from giving to this practical and efficient charity.

It takes money to run the Bowery Mission; coffee, bread and meat must be bought and paid for; a shelter must be provided temporarily for those without work or money. The men who give all their time to superintending and carrying on this work must be paid. To what greater or better charity could anyone subscribe than to this? If anyone should have but little faith in this kind of mission work, arguing that many of these men only attend for what they can get in the way of creature comfort, let him attend some of these meetings, and listen to the testimonies of those who have been saved through the ministrations of this Mission. Let those whose hearts have become hardened through sad experience—in helping those who have proved unworthy, and who are wont to turn a deaf ear to the cry from the depths—let them go down to this place, and keeping eyes and ears open, let them watch the men who come into the Mission—hopeless, hungry and ragged—bankrupt in everything which makes life worth living. Watch the ray of hope that slowly steals over some faces as the men listen to the music, to the testimonies of those who have found themselves and their God, and to the loving words of the Superintendent, who pleads with them to heed the call of their Heavenly Father, who offers a refuge from all their griefs, and rest for their sin-tossed souls.

Go down to the Bowery Mission, O lukewarm and indifferent Christian, and have your heart warmed, your right hand strengthened, and see what a mighty work is being done.

A dollar will go a long way, and will give a Thanksgiving dinner to a number of these poor men, who, perhaps, need but this to give them strength to break the chains which sin and misery have forged around them. A very little money will bring a Thanksgiving to some of these men, and the gift will make a happier Thanksgiving for the donor. M. S. H.

For shaving Ivory Soap is preferred by many. Its lather is profuse. Hot water instantly softens the surface but does not melt the cake to waste in the cup. Ivory Soap is aseptic and odorless and rinses away entirely, leaving the face smooth and absolutely clean. It costs about one-fifth as much as most of the so-called shaving soaps.

ABOUT HANDS AND FEET

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I REMEMBER in my early childhood," said the minister's wife, as she finished folding up the last package of garments for the missionary barrel, "seeing a lady who had been born without hands. She was a pretty, animated person, with black eyes and a clever tongue, and her people made a good deal of money out of her misfortune, as they carried her about for exhibition. Her feet, which I fancy she seldom used to walk upon, served her instead of hands. Very dexterously she could hold the pen or the scissors between her toes, and she not only wrote a very beautiful script, but cut out of paper many curious and pretty pictures, including profiles of her visitors in black paper. Poor woman! could any calamity be greater than never to have any hands to use?"

"Well," replied Aunt Betsy, looking whimsically at her own hands, roughened and knotted by the labors of many years, "I am not so sure. My hands have always had to toil so steadily, that I am doubtful whether I will be able to fold them when I get to heaven."

"Is it your idea, Aunt Betsy," said a young girl in the circle, "that in heaven people sit forever with their hands folded in utter idleness? That is not my thought of it at all. I believe we shall be as busy there as here, only we shall never have to do anything that we do not enjoy."

Aunt Betsy shook her gray head, "You are young, my child," she said, "and you have never known what it is to be all tuckered out. I shall rest if I can for at least a hundred years before I so much as touch a golden harp, or walk around among the angels, or do the least thing except get rested, when I am once safely home in my Father's house. I often tell Reuben that things are queer, for he and I have had more than our share of hard work and hard knocks, and we both of us know what it is to be tired all to pieces."

"Now, Aunt Betsy," said the minister's wife, looking up cheerily, "you put down that sewing and sit right still in your chair, until I bring you a nice, hot cup of tea. You shall not do a blessed thing this whole afternoon, and we who are younger will wait on you hand and foot."

So Aunt Betsy had an afternoon of real peace. After she and the rest had gone home, the minister's wife and I sat down by the fire, in the twilight, for a bit of such chat as we used to have when we were girls together, and went to school half a lifetime ago. Instead of drifting into sentiment, we began to talk in a most practical fashion on the subject of hands and feet. The latter were ever pressing topics of interest in the parsonage, because there were six children, and they wore out shoes faster than the minister found it easy to provide new ones. The older children were reaching the age when they had ideas of their own about their dress.

"Cynthia," said the minister's wife, "is a good deal worried because I will not let her wear a tight shoe. Her feet, and her hands, too, are at the stage when they look a little large in proportion to the rest of her body, and she does not understand that they will not keep on growing, but will soon reach their fullest development, while she herself will stretch up and fill out, until she makes a fine, tall girl."

"You are very wise," I said, "to insist on a shoe for Cynthia, and for the others as well, that fits the foot comfortably, and is just a little bit longer than the child would prefer it to be. An infant's foot is the most beautiful thing in the world, but the foot of a young maiden, or a young man is seldom so perfect. People cram their feet from childhood, into shoes too tight for them, or force them into footgear too short, with the result that corns and bunions produce untold misery. I knew a bride, who squeezed her feet on her wedding day into shoes so absurdly small that she never afterward was able to get them on. How she managed in the first instance was a marvel. I have seen women who were shocked at Chinese foot-binding, and thought it barbarous, yet they compressed their feet into boots which were so uncomfortable that they could not walk with grace, but merely hobbled about like cripples. Fashionable girls to-day are so silly as to put on slippers with high heels, set like pivots, almost in the middle of the sole, and the sum total of the whole wretched business is that hundreds of women go about enduring agonies worthy of the Inquisition. Whatever the children say, you, as their mother, are right in insisting that they shall wear shoes that fit comfortably and that are a trifle too long. Not loose shoes, though. They are as bad as tight ones."

"The shoes cost a small fortune," said the mother, wearily. "That is true enough," I said, "yet it is better to spend money on shoes than on almost any other part of children's dress. Growing boys and girls need stout, serviceable clothes, warranted to wear, but they do not require very many changes. There is no wit in elaboration of any kind on their garments. Cheap stuffs do well enough for them. Tell the dear home people who send you trunks full of things for your bonny flock, now and then, to give you money that you may be helped out on the shoe question, and say that you will gladly do without some of the other things they lavishly send."

I have been thinking about it since that day, and have reached the conclusion that the secret of appearing well dressed is to have hands and feet properly equipped. A nice glove and a nice shoe give a woman a well-dressed look, even if the rest of her attire be very plain. As for hands, they are servants of the body, just as feet are. From the hour we begin to walk alone, hands and feet are servants of the brain, quickly obeying its behest. It is a sign that a little child has a good brain if it is naturally deft and sure in the use of its hands. A weak, shambling gait is most lamentable in man or woman, and is a token of indecision of character.

Speaking of hands, the most beautiful hands in the world are those that most generously and ungrudgingly toil for others. Who does not love to remember the mother's hands, that in the old farmhouse were unremitting in their care, that made, and mended, and saved, and planned, that kneaded bread, and tucked the bedclothes around the children at night, and were always working, not for mother's self, but for mother's dear ones? Heaven bless the mother's hands that we remember.

I sometimes think that we are not quite fair to our feet. They carry us all our days. Longfellow's poem comes to mind.

Oh little feet, that such long years,
Must wander on through toil and tears.

Think of the laboring feet that go forth morning after morning to factories and shops; millions of feet treading the way to business in the morning, and joyfully treading it back to the home at night.

Think of the children's feet, pattering here and there through the house, little feet that make such music, as the children run to and fro, and think then of the slowly moving feet of old age, feet that must go more and more slowly until they cease any more to journey up and down the ways of the world.

Then, going back, let us be fair to our own faithful feet. Let us be content to stand upon them and not to lean upon somebody else. Let us treat them as well as we can, dress them as comfortably as we can, and never suffer from them any torture which is of our own devising.

A PEARL

DEEP in the silent bosom of the sea
A grain of sand entered a breathing shell.
A pang! a pain!—but nature, dealing well,
Sought then the little sufferer to free.
She covered the rough sand so perfectly,
That when into the hand of man it fell,
No word could all its worth or beauty tell—
A pearl—a pearl! that pang had come to be.
List, weary sufferer, 'tis message thine:
Without the pang, the pearl had never been.
O, 'tis when Love divine encrusts the woe,
With heaven's enamel, that the pang will shine,
Illuming all the heart with joy within,
The spirit swept by peace in overflow.

How Rose Valente Achieved a Fortune

An Interesting Story of How a Young Woman Succeeded in Business —A Chance for Others to Do So Too.

A young lady of Medina, N. Y., has recently had an experience which has made her envied by all her friends. She is Miss Rose Valente, of 142 Center street. A reporter to-day asked her for the facts. She modestly refused to discussed the matter, and simply handed him the following letter which she wrote to a prominent educator and which fully explains her story:

"I write you this letter as a statement of my success after taking your instruction in bookkeeping and to inform you how pleased I am with the position you secured for me.

"When I first wrote to you, I had no idea that bookkeeping could be learned so thoroughly and so easily by correspondence. My friends laughed at the idea, and I had always thought it necessary to attend a business college to learn bookkeeping, but such is positively not the case. I devoted from one half hour to an hour to the study each evening, and in three weeks' time I had a much better knowledge of bookkeeping than the average student who attends a business college during the same period. I know this to be true because I questioned a young man who was taking a course in a first-class business college, and he did not begin to have the practical information I had.

"As soon as I finished the course, I accepted a position that you gave me. I went to work with a great deal of nervousness. After the first day this passed away, because I quickly found out that the practical hints which you taught me enabled me to take hold at once, and by the second week I had charge of a set of books which would stagger many experienced bookkeepers. The fact that my employer has raised my salary twice within the past three months is the best proof that my work has been satisfactory. I advise any one who anticipates taking a course in bookkeeping to take your course. It would be impossible for any one to attend a business college and get the same attention that you give your students, I have learned that if one attends a business college he is filled full of a lot of fancy theories that amount to nothing when he begins practical work. Your course covers the entire field. When I accepted this position I seemed to have just exactly the knowledge I required.

"The advantage in taking a course by correspondence is that when you wish to refer to it, you always have it handy, while in taking a personal course you must depend upon memory. During the first few days, I was compelled to refer to the course. After I did this a few times, I had no trouble.

"I inclose an express money order to pay my tuition. Your offer is certainly a fair one. I should like to know the business college that will allow its students to pay their tuition after the college places them in a position. They do not do this.

"You must pardon me if I appear too enthusiastic, but several of my friends treated this matter as a joke when I decided to take it up, and the joke is now on them. Had I gone to a business college I would not be through yet, and would have spent a great deal. As it now stands, I have a nice position, and did not have to pay a cent for instruction until you placed me in a position.

"Again thanking you for what you have done for me, I am, very gratefully yours,

"ROSE R. VALENTE."

Our free book, "How to Succeed in Business," started Miss Valente on the road to success. It tells you how you can learn bookkeeping and pay your tuition after we place you in a position. It tells you about the most wonderful system of accounting ever discovered. It contains information that, more than anything else, will help you succeed in life.

DIAMONDS ON CREDIT

WRITE TO-DAY FOR CATALOGUE

THE LOFTIS SYSTEM permits you to have a great Christmas for a very little money. With five or ten dollars for a first payment you can make the gift of all gifts—a Diamond. Whether as an emblem of plighted troth, or as a Christmas remembrance to wife, sweetheart, mother, daughter or sister, it is always a seasonable gift and always the most highly prized. It lasts forever, and every day brings to the wearer pleasant thoughts of the giver and his generosity.

Diamonds on Credit

under the LOFTIS SYSTEM means that any person of honest intentions, no matter how far away they may live, may open a Confidential Charge Account for a Diamond, Watch or other valuable article of jewelry, and pay the same in a series of easy monthly payments.

How to Do It

Write to-day for our beautifully illustrated Catalogue, and from it select any article that you would like to wear or own; or, perhaps use as a gift to a loved one. We will send your selection on approval to your home, place of business or express office as you prefer. Examine it as leisurely and as carefully as you wish; then, if it is all that you anticipated, and the best value you ever saw for the money asked—pay one-fifth of the price and keep it. The balance you may send us in eight equal monthly payments.

On the Other Hand

if you decide not to buy, simply return the article to us at our expense. Whether you buy or not, we pay all express and other charges—you pay nothing, neither do you assume any risk or obligation whatever. We submit our goods on their merits, with absolute confidence that their quality, low price and our easy terms of payment will command your favor. We ask but one opportunity for adding your name to the largest list of pleased customers with which a Diamond house was ever honored.

We Are the Largest House in the Diamond business. We are also one of the oldest—Est. 1858. We refer to any bank in America—ask your local bank how we stand in the business world. They will refer to their Commercial Agency books and tell you that we stand very high, and that our representations may be accepted without question.

Our Guarantee Certificate

given with every Diamond, is the broadest and strongest ever issued by a responsible concern. Further, we give the broad guarantee of complete satisfaction to every purchaser. Our exchange system is the most liberal ever devised, for it permits you to return any Diamond bought of us, and get the full amount paid in exchange for other goods or a larger Diamond.

Your Christmas Plans will not be complete until you have looked through our Catalogue, and considered what you can do in gift-making in conjunction with the LOFTIS SYSTEM. The $5 00 which you might pay for something cheap and trashy, will make the first payment on, and put you in immediate possession of a splendid Diamond or Watch. You can thus make gifts that are commensurate with, and appropriate to the circumstances, without any considerable initial outlay. Don't wait until the last minute—write for Catalogue to-day. There can be no more favorable time than the present for buying a Diamond. Prices are advancing steadily and a profit of 15 or 20 per cent. within a year seems assured. Dealers generally agree in this prediction.

To the Cash Buyer of Diamonds, we have a proposition to make which is thoroughly characteristic of our house. It is nothing less than a written agreement to return all that they pay for a Diamond—less ten per cent., at any time within one year. Thus, one might wear a fifty dollar Diamond for a whole year, then send it back and get $45.00, making the cost of wearing the Diamond less than ten cents per week.

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. It is a really local experience, with the names only slightly veiled, and the facts easily recognizable. The great audience sits spellbound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told. Over three thousand persons sign the pledge, as the result of the story. An explosion wrecks the Beacon office and press, and injures George. Douglas pluckily continues publication, with the aid of friends. Hopes brighten, and the outlook for the revived Beacon, and the cause it represents, gradually improves. The little temperance group at Colby hears of the approaching wedding of Esther and Douglas.

HE took out of a pocket-book that contained a miscellaneous collection of bric-a-brac, some folded newspaper clippings, and handed them over to Douglas

They were from the Clinton Mail, and under the caption of "Thinklets." Some of them were so preposterously funny, that as Douglas glanced through them he roared. George regarded him with unusual solemnity.

"What does the Mail give you for these?" Douglas asked, looking at George with some added respect.

George hesitated. "They don't give me much of anything."

"I'll give you two dollars a week for them."

"You will! But I don't think I can furnish them every week. They don't come to me only now and then."

"Well, I'll give you two dollars for an instalment now and then."

"May I use a nom de plume?"

"As many as you like. Does the editor of the Mail know who you are?"

"I don't think so," George replied with a grin. "I suspect he thinks may be you are the author."

"I! How so?"

"Why, my nom de plume is 'Dug-Out.' These Thinklets are not easy to get. They come hard. I think the editor of the Mail sees in the 'Dug' the first syllable of your name."

Douglas laughed until he cried. George stood looking at him in the same solemn manner.

"But you have not told me about the write-up for the Mail. Honest, Mr. Douglas, I'll do my best with it. You can read it over to see if it's all right. We can't very well have a write up in the Beacon, can we?"

"Hardly. But—well. I don't care. Yes, you can write for the Mail, if you let me see it before it is sent."

"All right, Mr. Douglas. I couldn't bear to think of that Burroughs handling the matter. He wouldn't have no more sense of the affair than if it was just an ordinary prescription of quinine or some old drug."

When the happy day came it proved to be one of the most perfect June days the two lovers had ever seen. It was before the era of "showers" for the bride, but in the library-room was a small display of gifts sent by Esther's friends. Mr. Edwards, who was nothing if not practical, gave a handsome dining-room table; Mrs. Edwards, a full set of table linen. The Vernons contributed some silverware. Esther's father presented them with a set of furniture, and the aunt with a dozen standard authors. Quits' gift was a tasteful picture for the parlor, and George sent a box of highly-colored and especially highly-scented toilet soap, together with half a dozen towels, accompanied with some original verses set up by himself and run off on the galley. The whole gift convulsed Douglas and Esther, and the sight of George himself that night, dressed in a new suit, and in tortures over a high collar and a white tie, nearly upset Douglas during the ceremony.

After it was over, and they were all seated at the banquet table, there was quite a solemn pause after Mr. Vernon had asked grace. Mr. Edwards broke the ice by getting up and going into the other room. He came back bearing two packages.

He set the first one down in front of the bride and groom, winking at the company.

Esther opened the package, and found a large blank book with a cover, which was a fac-simile of the first number of the Beacon, and a page of directions explaining the purpose of the volume.

"It's nothing but a newspaper scrap-book, Esther," Mr. Edwards explained. "You're a school ma'am no longer. You're an editor's wife. But you'll see from the directions that you can use the book to paste in cuttings that bear on the temperance question in the State. There is nothing more interesting in the country at present."

The other package Mr. Edwards took out of a bag and set it down in front of the embarrassed George. It was an apple-pie of unusual size, ornamented on top with the boy's initials in red lozenges.

"I thought, maybe, George would feel lonesome if he didn't have something to occupy his mind," Mr. Edwards said. "And so I had Wallace, the baker, make this to order. If you can lift your mouth over the edge of your collar, George, you will find that pie all right."

This effectually broke up all the ice that was left, and the banquet was proceeding merrily when Douglas exclaimed:

"I declare, I forgot my gift to the bride."

"Didn't you kiss her? If you forgot it, I'll do it for you with pleasure," said Edwards.

Douglas took out a letter and handed it to Esther.

"With the compliments of the editor, Mrs. Douglas," he said.

Esther colored beautifully and opened

NOTABLE CONTRIBUTORS TO THE CROWN ENCYCLOPEDIA

EVERY home should own an up-to-date encyclopedia. Hardly a day passes but some subject, some town, or some person is mentioned, that requires "looking up." Wives and husbands ask each other questions, and children ask parents questions, which cannot be intelligently answered offhand. At such times an encyclopedia must be consulted, and it must be an up-to-date work in order to give satisfaction. We live in a wide-awake age; conditions change quickly, and only Twentieth Century Information can meet Twentieth Century Requirements.

About five years ago, Queen Victoria, Gladstone, Salisbury, Bismarck, McKinley and Pope Leo were prominently in the public eye—to-day they have all passed from the scene, and others have come to the front. Twenty years ago the telephone and electric light were in their infancy; the X-ray, Trolley, Automobile, Acetylene, Color Photography, and Wireless Telegraphy had not been heard of; while the Cuban War, the Boer War, Boxers, Dowieism, the Panama Canal Purchase, the Hague Tribunal and the Alaska Boundary Decision, were nearly all unknown even a few years ago: yet who to-day can claim to be reasonably well-informed without an intelligent acquaintance with these important phases in national and international development?

The Crown Encyclopedia supplies all this information in compact form, and it is the only really up-to-date work of its kind. Not a word it contains was put into type before October 1, 1903, and the last of its five volumes went to press as late as November 1, 1903, less than a month ago. Each article was brought up to the very latest date possible, and thus The Crown Encyclopedia is practically abreast of To-Day.

FOR an Intelligent Family, there is no Christmas Present in the World preferable to a full set of The Crown Encyclopedia. Whether intended for your Own Home, your Parents, your married Son or Daughter, your Pastor, or Sunday School Teacher, The Crown Encyclopedia will give Greater Satisfaction to the Giver, as well as to the Fortunate Recipient, than any other Set of Books or Article. If you wish to make a very Rich Present, Send $1.00 Extra for Fine Half-Leather Binding. Money Refunded if you are not Delighted. This great Work, The Crown Encyclopedia, consisting of 5 Volumes, Containing 3,000 Pages, 500 Illustrations and 96 Colored Maps, all Superbly Bound in Vellum de Luxe Cloth and genuine Gold Stamp, together with "The Christian Herald," the Queen of American Weeklies, for One Year, and Our Butterfly Calendar—All For Only $3.00. Do You Wish This Butterfly Calendar?

RARELY, if ever, has a calendar been issued that can compare with our Superb Drop-Leaf Butterfly Calendar for 1904 and 1905. The best artists known were engaged to reproduce in all their Natural Brilliancy and Richness of Coloring a series of Tropical and Semi-Tropical Butterflies, and The Forbes Lithograph Company had the original butterflies continually at hand, to enable them, step by step, to compare their work with nature's product.

They have marvelously succeeded in accurately reproducing all the delicate tracings, and never was more perfect work issued from any lithographic press. Four Lovely Children's Faces lend additional grace and beauty to this Art Production, which covers a space, when unfolded, of 10½ by 29 inches, or over 300 Square Inches, and supplies the calendar for Two Whole Years. This Artistic Gem will beautify many a home during the coming two years.

Red Letter Bible — Two Great

This Beautiful Large Type Bible, Bound in Soft Flexible Leather, with Overlapping Edges, Divinity Circuit and Genuine Workers, Christian Endeavorers, Epworth Leaguers, Baptist Young People, Pastors, Evangelists, and Y. M. C. A. Members. It

Explanatory

THIS EDITION of the Holy Scriptures is the Authorized Version, Self-pronouncing and unchanged save for the variation of color in the type. Two colors (red and black) are employed, in accordance with the following simple plan devised by Dr. Louis Klopsch:

1. In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of our Lord and Saviour are printed in red.
2. In the Old Testament, the passages printed in red are those quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which He referred.
3. Red lettering in the Reference Column of the Old Testament directs the reader to some particular utterance of Christ, in which the corresponding quotation or allusion may be found.
4. A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that, in the concurrent opinion of scholars and theologians, the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ.

No Other Bible

LIKE UNTO THIS!

Here the actual words, quotations, references and allusions of Christ, not separated from their context, nor in a fragmentary or disconnected form, but in their own proper place, as an integral part of the Sacred Record, stand out vividly conspicuous in the distinction of color.

Special Notice

The Speed Required for printing this Circular may Throw Out the Alignment of the Passages Printed in Red. IT IS NOT SO in the Red Letter Bible Itself.

11 He answered them, He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed, and walk.

12 Then asked they him, What man is that which said unto thee, Take up thy bed, and walk?

13 And he that was healed wist not who it was: for Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place.

14 Afterward Jesus findeth him in the temple, and said unto him, Behold, thou art made whole: sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee.

15 The man departed, and told the Jews that it was Jesus, which had made him whole.

16 And therefore did the Jews persecute Jesus, and sought to slay him, because he had done these things on the sabbath day.

17 ¶ But Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.

18 Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God.

Contains the CONCORDANCE, Subject-Index, Persons, Places and Things, Gazetteer, and Dictionary, all under ONE Alphabetical Arrangement, together with Helps and Maps.

In the Red Letter Bible, more clearly than in any other edition of the Holy Scriptures, it becomes plain that, from beginning to end, the central figure upon which all lines of law, history, poetry and prophecy converge is Jesus Christ the Saviour of the world. It sheds a new radiance upon the sacred pages, by which the reader is enabled to trace unerringly the scarlet thread of prophecy from Genesis to Malachi. Like the Star which led the Magi to Bethlehem, this light, shining through the entire Word, leads straight to the person of the Divine Messiah, as the fulfilment of the promise of all the ages.

'Force-thoughts"

By SUNNY JIM

I BELIEVE that the man of to-day has what might be called a light-running, indoor stomach.

¶A few centuries ago we were all out-door dwellers — Robber Barons, Cannibal Kings, Doughty Knights and such historical novel characters. We ate great meals of half-cooked meats, washed them down with gallons of mead and ale, and got along splendidly. Because we lived out-doors and had out-door-stomachs.

¶There was little machinery in those days and we did more muscle work. Cities like London were next door to the country; to-day it's all different.

¶It's time diet changed to suit the times.

If machinery does most of the muscle work nowadays, it must also help us with our digestion. "Force" is the furthest advance towards an ideal food for the stomach of to-day. Just now we want as much nutrition as we did when we were Robber Barons, but only half as much work for these light-running, indoor stomachs of ours.

¶"Force" forms the morning meal of two million clear-eyed, quiet-nerved people—the members of "The 'Force' Society."

Their day's work is easier than other folks'.

They do not Hurry.
Nor Worry!
They say to the rest of the world each morning,
Be Sunny.

¶Which reminds me that I've written a book—my first.

It treats of two subjects: how to serve "Force" in many ways, and how to be sunny—always. It's worth so much I can't charge for it—except a two-cent stamp, which, if you'll send with the coupon below, will entitle you to one copy.

Yours truly,

Sunny Jim

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

V. W. O., Clearwater, Fla. What is meant by the case of the house swept and garnished (Matt. 12:44), to which the demon returned?

It is a warning to nations and individuals against stopping short in reformation. There had been a movement in the direction of righteousness under the preaching of John the Baptist, but it had halted with the negative renunciation of certain sins, and did not go on to active and positive righteousness. That the last state of that generation was worse than the first, was proved when it crucified Christ. A modern illustration is that which threatens Japan, of abandoning Buddhism to become infidel, instead of going on to Christianity. In the case of an individual we have seen a reformation of conduct, under terror of future punishment; but instead of accepting Christ and going on to active service, there was a period of good behavior distracted by desire for the sins given up, followed by a return to those sins, and a condition of hardened indifference, in which other and worse sins were committed.

Mrs. Kingsley, Chandler's Valley, Pa., would like some reader to send her a copy of the verses:

Who'll care for me when I am old,
And withered grown and gray.

"Poor Weak Sinner," ——. 1. Is there any hope of forgiveness for one who, after having made profession of conversion, has fallen into grievous sin? 2. What is meant by "the second death" referred to in Rev. 2: 11?

1. There is not only hope, but certainty, of forgiveness when the sinner sincerely repents, quits the sin, and pleads for pardon through Christ. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanses from all sin" (see I. John 1: 7). The backslider is encouraged to return to God and is promised welcome and restoration. The essential thing is that he shall be sincerely sorry for his sin, and resolved in Christ's strength never to repeat it. David, whose sin was very vile (see II. Sam. 11), was forgiven. 2. It is an expressive phrase, describing the punishment of those who die impenitent. It emphasizes the contrast between their condition and that of those who inherit eternal life. Such phrases as "dead in trespasses and sins," show that the second death does not necessarily imply the annihilation of the wicked dead.

Bible Student, Oakland, Kans. Is there not a discrepancy between Paul's own account (in Gal. 1: 17) of his proceedings, and the account given in the Acts? In the one case he is represented as going to Arabia for three years and in the other as beginning to preach immediately after his conversion and going to Jerusalem.

It is difficult to construct a consistent chronology of Paul's life, because Luke concerns himself less with personal details than with the progress of the churches. Paul's journey to Arabia, if Luke had mentioned it, would probably have been placed after Acts 9: 25. There is evidently a hiatus between that verse and the next. Many things that Paul mentions as having occurred to him, Luke does not record (see II. Cor. 11: 25). As the three years were probably years of study and retirement, Luke, if he knew of them, perhaps passed them over to relate matters of more stirring import concerning the work of planting churches.

Mrs. M. A. Corvallis, Oreg., sends us an account of the fanatical "zealot worshipers" of that section. Claiming to believe the end of the world to be at hand, they have destroyed their furniture, clothing and a number of domestic animals. The leaders were arrested, examined and ordered to leave the county.

Subscriber, Madison Co., N. Y. 1. Is it possible for a man who has committed deliberate murder ever to be saved? 2. How many soldiers were employed as guard at Christ's tomb? 3. Was Nathanael ever an apostle?

1. Assuredly he will be, if he seeks forgiveness and salvation through Christ. The assurance is given that the blood of Jesus cleanses from all sin (I. John 1: 7). There was no exception to Christ's promise that none who came to him should be cast out (John 6: 37). The statement (I. John 3: 15) that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him, would appear to refer to him at the time of his committing the crime. It must be very hard for a man so wicked to turn to Christ sincerely for salvation, and we doubt if many of those who profess to have done so, before being executed, did so in reality; but we have no doubt that all cases of genuine repentance and faith were accepted of God. 2. We are not told. Some commentators who have studied Roman customs say four, others larger numbers. Barnes thinks there were sixty. 3. His name is not mentioned among the twelve, but in all the lists given by the evangelists Philip's name is associated with Bartholomew, which suggests the possibility of Nathanael being identical with Bartholomew. The latter name simply means the son of Tholomew, which Nathanael may have been.

Reader. What are the surface indications of the presence of oil?

We have submitted this letter to the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C., and Chief Clerk H. C. Kizer kindly furnishes the following answer:

No categorical answer can be given which covers all cases. Oil is found in rocks of very different ages, from the Lower Silurian to the latest Tertiary, and at greatly varying depths, from 1,000 to 2,000, to as many hundred feet. The character of the surface indications depends upon many factors, such as the character of the oil itself, the character of the rocks in which it is contained, its depth below the surface, and the character of the overlying rocks. Where the oil is at a considerable depth, and is overlain by compact impervious beds, as is the case in most of the Ohio and Pennsylvania fields, it affords no surface indication of its presence. Occasionally, even where it occurs at great depths, and in old and thoroughly consolidated rocks, its presence is indicated by gas and oil springs. Such springs on Oil Creek, Pennsylvania, and Seneca Creek, New York, gave the first clue to the presence of the Appalachian oil fields. Where the oil is contained in unconsolidated beds, as in Texas and California, it is much more apt to afford surface indications, and these consist usually of tar or asphalt springs, such as are very common in California. In Texas, the oil is usually associated with large bodies of native sulphur, and the most common surface indications of its presence are sulphur and gas springs. Any one prospecting for oil should study thoroughly the geology of the region which he is prospecting, and especially the character and structure of the underlying rocks. With the information thus obtained he will be able to determine the probable depth and character of the oil, if oil is present, and with these data he may then determine the character of the surface indications which will most likely be afforded by the oil.

Isaac S., Tyler, Minn. Where did the phrase "Mind your P's and Q's" originate?

It is said to have originated in the phrase, "Mind your p's (pieds, feet), and q's (queues, wigs)," which was common in the days of Louis XIV. of France, when great formality was observed at court in walking and bowing, and the wig was apt to become disarranged. There are other explanations, but the foregoing seems to be the most reasonable.

F. A. F., Kingston, Ja., B. W., writes:

If L. J. B., Hemlock, Mich. (in Mail Bag, Christian Herald, Oct. 14, 1903), who asks: "Do not the theories of how the world came into existence show the account in Genesis to be absurd?" will read a book entitled Work Days of God, or Science and the Bible, written by Herbert W. Morris, A.M., D.D.; and supplement his reading with Earth's Earliest Ages, by G. H. Pember, M.A., he can then read Romans 9, 20 with profit. The Bible does not deal with theories.

Curious, Baltimore, Md. Among the mass of immigrants who come here, which nationality is the most provident and brings the best provision for a start in the new world?

This question is most satisfactorily answered in the report of the Commissioner General of Immigration for the twelve months preceding October last He says:

As showing the comparative thrift of the races, attention is directed to the fact that the 71,782 Germans brought $2,480,634, while 106,117 South Italians brought only $2,159,017, and 28,451 English $1,405,365, and the same number of Magyars showed only $341,401, and 32,607 Croatians and Slavs only $407,117.

You can readily figure out for yourself the per capita financial standing of the different nationalities.

W., Idaho Falls, Idaho. In your Question and Answer column, you remark, in substance, on Dowieism, that it will "prosper or decay according to whether or not it be of God." What about Mormonism?

You might with equal justice ask the same question concerning any other "ism." If in God's eye a thousand years are as but a day, it is evident that the duration, even of the longest-lived system of error, is not so remarkable after all.

M. S., Shepherdsville, Ky. We saw among the Scotch-Irish of the Kentucky mountains a brother of the prospective bride, and two attendants, going over the mountain with a white banner and blue streamer, to the home of the prospective groom, to conduct him back to the home of the bride, for a "high noon" wedding. Have they precedent for this in the old customs of the clans or peasantry?

In some parts of Scotland, we believe, it is the custom for the "best man" and his friends to escort the bridegroom to the house of the bride, immediately before the ceremony. The banner and streamer accompaniment is probably a local idea. It certainly is not tribal, as far as we can ascertain.

urious, Minneapolis, Minn. Is it warmer at any time north of the equator than south of it?
Physical maps show that the regions of reatest heat are found north of the equator, o that the average heat of the northern mmer is about 8 degrees higher than that outh of the equator, while the northern win- r is correspondingly colder. The reason is ie predominance of land in the northern emisphere, which is a good conductor of eat, absorbing and losing it with equal rapidy. Water is a poor conductor; hence the ceanic climate is more equable.

ary McA., Denver, Colo. Why is the Goddess of Liberty pictured with a cap of a peculiar fashion?
The statue in Rome shows her holding in r hand a cap which is the symbol of free- om. When the ancient Romans liberated a ave, they placed a piltus, a small red cap, on s head. He was then libertinus (a freed- an) and his name was registered. When turninus, in A.D. 263, seized the capital he oisted a cap on his spear, indicating that all e slaves who were minded to join his army ould be freed. After Cæsar's murder, the nspirators elevated a cap on a spear in token liberty.

, Troy, N.Y. What was the origin of the coat-of arms?
It was originally a surcoat, or overcoat, m by 'knights above their armor and corated with devices by which heralds or ers described the wearer. These were the t heraldic devices, so-called.

Annie Wilson McLane, Greensboro, N. C., s: an you not call attention to the great need re is in our land for more effort for Christ in be- f of the prisoners, especially those who are not he state prisons, but in county jails and convict mps? The state prisons are more apt to be re- mbered, but oh, the hundreds of prisoners in the nties, needing so pitifully the touch of His d; needing to be furnished with Bibles; need- to be pointed to Jesus Christ! Then, too, in ry county, there are the lonely inmates of the shouse, so often forgotten, so often hungry for ds about Him. They seem to form two dis- t classes right at our doors, both often lected. Won't you please plead for them, for sake, who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it not ... ld it not to me"?
The suggestion is one that deserves the erous consideration of Christian people. the "convict camps" are many hundreds risoners, white and black, practically with- the Gospel. Lately the chaplains of prisons in two Southern States called at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office in New York, and made personal appeal for the prisoners in their care. One of these chaplains had, besides the prison proper, several convict camps. The other had, in addition to his other work, some half a dozen Sunday Schools. With practically no allowance for carrying on their religious work, these good men were delighted to receive from the proprietor of this journal a package of Testaments and a box of good books. There are many prison chaplains, especially in the South, whom some of our readers may wish to help in the same way.

Subscriber, Woburn, Mass. 1. Is it honorable for a Christian business man to deal in trading stamps? 2. Is the system lawful in every State?

1. There is nothing dishonorable about it. It is an expedient which has been devised to increase trade and to attract custom. 2. Don't know of any State where it has been prohibited by law.

Ella R., Chillicothe, O. To my mind, the word "person" seems to be often misapplied. How should it be used?

It is from the Latin, persona, a mask, or personatus, a mask-wearer or actor. It does not mean the individual, but the character, as when we see in an actor merely the character he represents and not the man himself. Gradually, however, it has come to be practically synonymous with the individual.

Reader, Annapolis, Md. The line: "The light that never was on sea or land" is from a poem by William Wordsworth, suggested by a picture of Peele Castle in a storm. It is very frequently misquoted and miscredited.

Personal Request from Dr. Klopsch

AGAIN I appeal to the good readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—to whom I never appeal in vain—to help me in a matter which each and every year at this season gives me serious concern.

For the next thirty days mail and express facilities will be taxed to congestion, and unless we can attend to much of our shipping now, or very early in December, we fear that considerable disappointment must result all along the line from delay in deliveries.

This year particularly the problem assumes unusually large proportions, because our Crown Encyclopedia, of which probably 50,000 sets will be ordered in time for Christmas gifts, not to mention the tens of thousands of volumes of our other premiums. To handle all this material requires an enormous force. Many of the hands are new and inexperienced; all their work must be covered and checked before shipment, and this requires much time and imposes great managerial responsibility.

Then the many thousands of letters which we receive daily must be carefully and intelligently handled, without rush or confusion, if satisfactory service is to result.

Now, what can the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD do to help me in this matter? They can so arrange as to give me four weeks to do quietly, carefully, intelligently and satisfactorily, what otherwise might have to be rushed through amid hubbub and confusion in half the time, resulting in numerous mistakes, disappointments, complaints and dissatisfaction. The way they can aid me best is to send their renewals as soon as possible. They suffer no disadvantage, as the term is always advanced from the present date of expiry, while they greatly help me to give them good and prompt service.

Will you not kindly favor me by co-operating with me to the extent above mentioned, and thus help relieve my mind of much anxiety?

Wm. Klopsch

Be Sure You Come Home for Thanksgiving

A BOWERY MISSION INCIDENT

HARRY M. was a "waster." There was not a doubt about it. His hang-dog look, his slouchy, shuffling gait, his misfit, threadbare clothes, all betokened the confirmed and helpless tramp. And yet there were in him, as there are in nearly every man of his class when you can get down through the grim external and find them, wonderfully sweet, redeeming features.

He could never beg. That, to him, was something unspeakably low and horrible. So a feeling of pride, born of his better days, often caused him to almost die of hunger rather than ask for aid. Then he would steal into one of the city missions and sit, with a set white face, until kindly Christian workers, through persistent questioning, discovered the fact that he was on the verge of starvation, and succored him.

Another star that shone undimmed through the black darkness which had overtaken this wanderer, was his love for two baby girls he had left behind him, in a city up the State, ten long years ago. It was very strange, but very beautiful, that as the years passed by, instead of diminishing, this love for his children seemed to increase. Often, as he crept into some lumber pile or empty truck for his night's rest, or dreamily dozed on a park bench, or when, more fortunate, enjoyed the luxury of a lodging-house bed, he would murmur the words, "My children, my children," before falling into that deep sleep that only tramps and innocent children secure. And often, when some light-hearted child, of apparently the same age as one of his own, would pass him in the street, he would turn and look, and sometimes follow, with the same words trembling on his lips, "My children!"

But neither his pride, nor his love for his children, were sufficient to lift him from the depths into which he had fallen. It had not been a sudden fall, but a ten years' gradual gravitation, gaining increased momentum every year, until now it seemed as though he could neither fall nor slide much lower.

In the happy days of his young manhood, his prospects had been exceedingly bright. He was intelligent and businesslike beyond most men. He was cheerful and genial in disposition. He occupied a lucrative position in one of the largest commercial houses in his native city. He was happily married to a congenial wife. Then the serpent found an entry into the domestic Eden. Just about the time the second baby girl came to the home, the father became a frequenter of the hotel cafe. The habit grew upon him with frightful rapidity, and it knew no respite. In a few months, he became utterly incapacitated for business, and lost his position. Thinking a change of scene might help him, he came to New York City. Here he readily found an opening, for he was still young and active, and his splendid business ability was quickly discerned. But the old enemy dogged his footsteps. The temptations of the city were too strong for him. Again and again he went down. One employer after another tried him, appreciated him, then doubted, and finally discarded him.

When, nearly three years ago, he entered the Bowery Mission on that never-to-be-forgotten night, there was, as we have said, no doubt about it, he was a "waster."

He sat through the meeting white-faced and despairing. Not a glimmering of hope was there in his deep-set eyes. It was long since he had heard from home. His friends knew nothing of his whereabouts. Even his long-suffering wife had given him up. His well-to-do relatives had come almost to hope that he were dead. He knew all this. He felt himself alone—oh, so terribly alone in the world.

Many a time he had attended mission meetings, but merely that he might get his poor, tired body rested. The hymns, the testimonies, the addresses had no meaning for him. He had sunk into that dull, dead apathy, which is the awful characteristic of the "rounder," the "dead-beat."

Suddenly, however, he found himself listening to some one—he never knew who it was—telling a simple story of a child's love—a child, who had loved a drunken father, when everyone else condemned and hated. He could scarcely believe it, but found that tears were silently coming from his eyes; eyes that had never known a tear since childhood. When the simple story finished with the declaration that the child's love had saved the father, he found his soul all aglow with a new hope. Was it possible that he too might, through God's grace, see his children again? His mind was made up. He came forward for prayers in the after-meeting, surrendered himself to God, and then, oh, as he looks back upon it now, how wonderfully easy it all seems to have been, as soon as God took a hand in it!

No one doubted his sincerity as he started out that night to do the right. It was a terrific struggle for the first twelve months; but never once did he yield to the tempter. After several months of thoroughly disheartening experience in seeking employment, he at last obtained a position in one of the large dry-goods establishments. With his sober and regular life all his old business faculties returned, and he eventually became one of the most trusted and valued employes of the house.

Then, with twelve months of consistent Christian life behind him, he set out with great trepidation to seek his lost ones. He feared that he would find all doors closed against him. Years ago his relatives had uttered this decree. It was ten years since he had seen his wife and babies; what had become of them he did not know, but he felt it was now his duty to set out to seek them.

It was a memorable morning, that on which he knelt with the Superintendent in prayer, and then started out on his mission. The next day he returned with a beaming face, and eyes swimming with tears of joy. He had found them. They were all alive. They were happy to have him back.

He went on with his work, and every night was to be found at the Mission doing effective work. One day he received a letter from his eldest child, a girl of twelve, and he felt he must read it to the meeting. When he came to one sentence his voice became tremulous; something like a sob escaped him and he sat down overcome. The Superintendent took the letter from his hands and read the words that had unmanned him. What wonder he had broken down! It was ten long years since he had spent a Thanksgiving Day at home; and what terrible experience he had passed through since then! Oh how many Thanksgiving Days had he wandered up and down the streets a homeless tramp! The words of his child were, "Be sure and come home for Thanksgiving."

And he did. Whilst the Bowery Mission gathering celebrated Thanksgiving Day in its usual festive way, he was home with his dear ones for the first time in ten sad, weary years. He was not forgotten that day by his Mission brethren. The Superintendent, Mr. Hallimond, had written this song; Mr. Benke, the Organist, had put it to beautiful music, and it was sung by Mrs. Hallimond:

Be Sure You Come Home for Thanksgiving

Be sure you come home for Thanksgiving,
You've been such a long time away;
We've felt all so lonely without you,
And we've watched for you night and day.
Dear father, the sad tears are falling,
From mother's sweet, pitiful eyes,
But her smile will come back when she sees you,
Like sunrays that brighten the skies.

Be sure you come home for Thanksgiving,
We yearn for the sight of your face;
We long to be clasped to your bosom,
In a loving and tender embrace.
Dear father, the shadows will vanish,
The clouds pass for ever away,
When you're home to partake and to heighten,
The joys of Thanksgiving Day.

Be sure you come home for Thanksgiving,
We'll count every moment till then;
For we'll be the merriest of children,
And you'll be the happiest of men.
We'll make it a real Thanksgiving,
Our praise like sweet music shall swell,
To Him who has brought back the wanderer,
To the Father who does all things well.

For the last year Harry M. has occupied a position with his old employers in his native city and is doing well. He occasionally visits the Bowery Mission, but never without one of his two little daughters, his love for whom was the means of his salvation.

The Very Best of Encyclopedias

The Twentieth Century Encyclopedia arrived Saturday, in perfect condition. To say that I am pleased only partly expresses it. The volumes are more than one-third larger than I had expected, and the pages are full and complete, with excellent illustrations. Your advertisement of the Encyclopedia in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not give one-half the good things to be found in it. In fact it is the best Encyclopedia I have ever seen. I would not take $30 for the set and have to do without it. (REV.) M. C. LUNSFORD, JR.

PILGRIMS AT AN ARMENIAN SHRINE IN KHOI

Persian Superstitions

Charms to Avert the Anger of the "Jins" or Spirits

MRS. HANNAH YOSEPH JACOBS, in a letter from Urmi, Persia, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, gives an interesting scription of some of the familiar superions that prevail in the homes of the st. She writes:

his morning, an old Armenian lady, ose beauty seventy-five cold Karadak ters had not marred yet, came in, and :

How is your health, Hakim Hanim? heart has been yearning to come and you. Being a little lame, I could very well manage it earlier."

Thank you, Mayrick" ("mother" in menian), I said. "I am quite well."

Have you any children?" she asked, etly.

Well, no," I said.

You remember," she went on, "I you last year to go to that Sayid Mohammedan, from the line of the phet), and have him write you a talisn to keep your children from being ured by the unsun, the 'jins' (fairies). ı see, my child, I am so much older n you are, and know so much more n you do. I will tell you what you e done without knowing—you have red water upon hot coals, or you have red some hot water upon earth, and e burnt and killed 'jin's' children."

Mayrick" (mother), I said, "we Protest- do not believe in such superstitions.

God, like a father, watches over us, and Satan has no power to injure us without his knowledge."

"My child, God does now allow; but, you see, you have killed the 'jin's' children, and they are taking revenge upon you. I give you advice. After this, whenever you pour water upon fire, you repeat these words, 'In the name of God.' The unsun will never dare to harm you and yours. But for your mistakes in the past you will have to atone. Go with a gift to that Sayid and he will give you a talisman, and you shall never regret it. You have received an injury from the unsun, and your remedy is a talisman from a Sayid, or a Jew, or a Kashish (Armenian priest). You will be fortunate if you find your right talisman soon, because sometimes it takes years to find the right person and place to get your talisman. Do not put it off," she went on. "Go and visit that Sayid. He knows much more than any one I have heard of."

I could not help laughing at her earnestness.

"Oh, do not laugh," she said very seriously. "I have seen it in my own cousin, who lost her children, until we got her a talisman from a man in Karadak, who was full of wisdom, and whose talismans never failed to do good. My cousin has three sons, who are like three golden rods. That man is dead now—God give rest to his bones!"

The Dwarfs of New Guinea

THE report of the ex-administrator of British New Guinea, Sir Francis Winter (says the London Daily Chronicle), gives to the world details concerning the curious marsh dwellers, the dwarf Ahgaiambo tribe. This remarkable race was found in an extensive tract of fen country near the Musa River. Sir Francis writes:

"Emerging from the forest, we came out on a flat covered with reeds and rank grass, and after walking a couple of hundred yards through this we arrived at the margin of an extensive sheet of shallow water. On the side of this mere, and close to a bed of reeds and flags, was a little village of the dwarf Ahgai-ambo tribe. After much shouting a man and a woman came across to us. Each came in a small canoe, which, standing up in, they propelled with a long pole. The Ahgaiambo have for a period that extends back beyond native tradition lived in this swamp. They never leave their morass, and the Barugi assured us that they are not able to walk properly on hard ground, and that their feet soon bleed if they try to do so. The man that came on shore was, for a native, middle-aged. His feet were short and broad, and very thin and flat, with, for a native, weak looking toes. This last feature was still more noticeable in the woman, whose toes were long and slight, and stood out rigidly from the foot, as if they possessed no joints. The feet of both the man and the woman seemed to rest on the ground as wooden feet would do. The skin above the knees of the man was in loose folds, and the sinewss and muscles around the knee were not well developed. I had a good view of our visitor while he was standing sideways toward me, and in figure and carriage he looked to be more ape-like than any human being that I have seen."

IN A MOROCCAN SLAVE MART

.....ONE OF THE FEW CORNERS OF THE EARTH WHERE SLAVERY STILL LINGERS

TO flatter Europe's susceptibilities (says S. L. Bensusan, in Black and White) there is no overt slave dealing in the Moroccan coast towns. Now slaves are bought and sold by the Atlantic seaboard, but always under the rose; and the necessity for secrecy sends the price up high.

In Mazagan, Casablanca and Mogador, slaves are sold only by private auction. Inland, at Mequinez, Marrakesh and Fez, the traffic flourishes unrebuked.

In to the slave market, at Marrakesh, where the wealthy Moors congregate towards the hour of sun-setting and the auctioneers assemble for preliminary prayer before they exhibit their human chattels to intending purchasers. There are some old men and old women, many middle-aged or in the prime of life, and plenty of children. One and all are distressed by their surroundings, the degree of their distress being regulated by the part of the world from which they come. Slaves from the Soudan show least emotion, and home-reared slaves the most; but the physical condition of all classes leaves nothing to be desired. They are well nourished and in good health; they have the strength and vitality of any score of the emaciated beggars who hide from the sun in the shadow of the city walls.

It is an unpleasant sight to see the intending purchaser examining a suitable slave. The bidder examines the teeth of the human chattel brought to him by the auctioneer, feels the biceps, and asks certain questions relating to past history and present health. Should the slave not prove to be as he or she is guaranteed, the sale is void, and the auctioneer's commission is forfeited.

A Moor may not enslave a Moor—a brother of the "True Faith." Very rich "True Believers" like to surround themselves with slaves, who serve the same purpose as flunkeys do in England. They buy little boy and girl slaves to be companions to their own children, and such slave children often rise to eminence. The father of the late Grand Wazeer Sid Ahmed bin Musa was a slave, and many of the country Kaids in the districts approaching the Sus exhibit unmistakable evidence of the negro blood in their veins.

Few slaves reach Morocco to-day from the South by the old caravan routes. In times gone by the camels used to leave the Maghreb with rock-salt, which was freely exchanged for captives by the tribes living on the edges of the desert. These unfortunates, if too young to walk, were packed in panniers on the camels and taken out once a day to be fed. Large numbers died.

The terrors of the Southern road are happily forgotten to-day. French occupation of the oasis of Tuat has cut off slave caravans in one direction, and the occupation of Timbuctoo has stopped supplies from the other quarter, with the result that the price of slaves from the interior has gone up considerably, and Moors possessing any, are careful to treat them well, and keep them in such condition as will enable them to fetch a good price.

Europeans are not readily admitted to the slave-market in any Moorish city The scene is very stirring and one that may not be forgotten. Perhaps the most striking feature of the procedure is the dignity with which it is conducted. The auctioneers march round and round the market, followed by the slaves they have to sell; the buyers, who are all men, sit round. The auctioneer proclaims the last price that has been offered for his wares, and when the buyer raises the price of any one, thanks Allah, who sends custom. Clad in bright clothes, the property of the auctioneer, the slaves soon recover the spirits that seemed lost when the sale began; if they speak Arabic they listen with some interest to the prices put upon themselves, and are obviously proud of their fine clothes. Tragedy and comedy stalk through the market hand in hand.

Saloon Smashing.

Citizens of Gainesville, Ga., have adopted the methods of Carrie Nation to purify their county. Since the decision at the polls, that the county should be dry, various resorts have been opened for the accommodation of people who want to drink. "Blind Tigers," as they are called, have supplied liquor contrary to law. Crimes have been committed in several places, which, it is believed, can be traced to the effects of the liquor thus sold, and the temperance people became exasperated at the bold evasion of the law. On November 11 the fire-bell was rung, and, as previously arranged, about 400 persons came together at the signal, at the City Hall. They were armed with axes, and they went through the city destroying all resorts in which the law was violated. After the work of demolition was completed, the leaders served notice on the proprietors of the liquor joints and other resorts that they must leave the county in ten days, and that no attempt to reopen their places will be tolerated.

The committee of citizens was comprised of the best people of the city, and was headed by the Rev. J. W. Wynne, pastor of the First Baptist Church. A mass meeting was held in the evening, at which a large sum was raised, to be used in the prosecution of any person who shall attempt to reopen one of the closed resorts.

Helping the Mountain Whites

The Woman's Home Mission Society has recently undertaken to establish an Industrial School for the poor white girls at Brevard, Transylvania County, in the very heart of the mountains of Western North Carolina. The school opened on Oct. 21, with fifty-two pupils, and others are being added. Some of them have been known to part with their spinning-wheels and other household belongings in order to procure books for their children. When the school opened, one girl walked ten miles to reach a train in order to be present. The Woman's Board of the M. E. Church South is embarrassed for funds to carry on this school, and would gratefully appreciate any help. Miss Belle Bennett, Richmond, Ky., is President of the Board.

Boyhood Days of Famous Divines

No. VII.—THEODORE L. CUYLER

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

THEODORE LEDYARD CUYLER was born in the beautiful village of Aurora, on the shores of Cuyuga Lake, Western New York. His father was a brilliant young lawyer, who died in the early age of twenty-eight, when Theodore was only four and a-half years old. The only recollection he has of his father is of his leading him to school in the morning, and that he once punished him for using a profane word that he had heard from some rough boys. Dr. Cuyler, in his Recollections of a Long Life, declares that that wholesome bit of discipline, administered at so early an age, kept him forever from forming the habit of swearing.

After the death of his father, he was left entirely in the care of his mother, who was a most devout woman, and who was, to use the good Doctor's own words, more to him than school, pastor or church, or all combined." The mother soon gave up her own house, and went to live with her father, Mr. Charles Horton Morrell, on the banks of the lake, a few miles south of Aurora. Like nearly all boys brought up in the country, Dr. Cuyler is thankful that the next seven or eight years of his happy childhood were spent on his grandfather's beautiful farm. He had the free, pure air of "God's outdoors." The simple pleasures of the farmhouse, and the woods were his. Out-of-school hours he drove the cows to the pasture, rode the horses when he got a chance, in the hayfield, and carried in the stock of firewood on winter afternoons. His closest friends were the house dog, the chickens, the kittens, and the pet sheep in his grandfather's flock. He grew up strong and hardy, with all the strength of the woods and of the hills. Dr. Cuyler has given this picturesque description of the country Sabbath of his boyhood:

"My Sabbaths in that rural home were like the good old Puritan Sabbaths, serene and sacred, with neither work nor play. Our church (Presbyterian) was three miles away, and in the winter our family often fought its way through deep mud, or through snowdrifts piled as high as the fences. I was the only child among grown-up uncles and aunts, and the first Sunday School I ever attended had only one scholar, and my good mother was the superintendent. See gave me several verses of the Bible to commit thoroughly to memory, and explained them to me. I also studied the Westminster Catechism. I was expected to study God's Book for myself, and not to sit and be crammed by a teacher, after the fashion of too many Sunday Schools in these days, where the scholars swallow down what the teacher brings to them, as young birds open their mouths and swallow what the old bird brings to the nest."

While still a small boy, Theodore acquired the thirst for reading. The books he had to feast on in the long winter evenings were such as Robinson Crusoe, Sanford and Merton, The Pilgrim's Progress and the few volumes in his grandfather's library that were within the mental grasp of a child eight or ten years old. He wept over Paul and Virginia and laughed over John Gilpin, the scene of whose memorable ride he, later in life, took much interest in visiting at the "Bell of Edmonton."

Cuyler's boyhood came at a time when intemperance and drunkenness were spreading terrible havoc. Liquor was used in the country almost as freely as in the town or city, and at log-rollings, house-raisings, and all sorts of public gatherings, vast quantities of strong drink were distributed. Especially was liquor considered absolutely essential in harvest-time. Theodore's grandfather was one of the first citizens of Cuyuga County to banish intoxicants from his farm, and Theodore himself signed a pledge of total abstinence when he was only ten or eleven years old. He enjoys relating, in these later days, how, even previous to his signing the temperance pledge, he had a taste of "Prohibition" that made a lasting impression on him. One day he discovered some "cherry-bounce" in a wine-glass on his grandfather's sideboard, and he ventured to swallow the tempting liquor. When his vigilant mother discovered what he had done, she took the rod to him, and administered a dose of Solomon's medicine in a way that made him "bounce" most cheerily. Cuyler declares that that made him a "teetotaller" for life.

It is interesting to note, in this connection, that the first address young Cuyler ever delivered, and while still in his buoyant boyhood, was in the city of Glasgow, at one of Father Matthew's great meetings. Dr. Cuyler's description of that occasion is of striking interest:

"When I made my first visit to Edinburgh, in 1842, I learned that a temperance society in that city was about to go over to Glasgow to meet the celebrated Father Theobald Matthew, who was making his first visit to Scotland. I joined my Edinburgh friends, and on arriving in Glasgow, we found a multitude of over fifty thousand people assembled on the green. In an open barouche, drawn by four horses, stood a short, stout Irishman, with a handsome, benevolent countenance, and attired in a long, black coat, with a silver medal hanging upon his breast. After the procession, headed by his carriage, had forced its way through the densely thronged street, it halted in a small, open square. Father Matthew dismounted, and began to administer the pledge of abstinence to those who were willing to receive it. They kneeled on the ground in platoons; the pledge was read aloud to them; Father Matthew laid his hands upon them, and pronounced a benediction. From the necks of many a small medal attached to a cord, was suspended. In this rapid manner, the pledge was administered to many hundreds of persons within an hour, and fresh crowds continually came forward.

"When I was introduced to the good man, he spoke a few kind words, and gave me an 'apostolic kiss' on my cheek. As I was about to make the first public speech of my life, I suppose I may regard that act of the great Irish Apostle as a sort of ordination to the ministry of preaching the Gospel of Total Abstinence."

In the days of Theodore Cuyler's childhood, the march of modern improvements had scarcely begun, especially in the interior sections. There was a small steamboat plying on the Cuyuga Lake, but there was not a single railway in the whole State. When Theodore went away to school in New Jersey, at the age of thirteen, the tedious journey by stage coach required three days and two nights; every letter from home cost eighteen cents for postage; and the youngsters pored over Webster's Spelling Book and Morse's Geography by tallow-dip candles. Gas lamps had not been even dreamed of in that day, and electricity was still farther away in the depths of the unknown. The wood fires were covered, in most houses, by nine o'clock on winter evenings.

Theodore Cuyler's preparation for college was largely under the private tutorship of a good old Dutch Dominie, named Garrit Mandeville. He obtained still farther light along the path of knowledge at the "Hill-Top School" at Mendam, New Jersey. The light was sufficient, and he was fitted to enter Princeton College at sixteen years of age and graduated at nineteen. During his infancy, his devout Christian mother had dedicated her only child to the Lord, in very much the same spirit as that in which Hannah dedicated her son Samuel. While he was still a child, his paternal grandfather, who was a lawyer, offered to bequeath his law library to Theodore; but his mother declined the tempting offer, and said to him: "I fully expect that my little boy will yet be a minister." This was her constant aim and perpetual prayer, and God graciously answered her prayer of faith in his own good time and way. A few years ago, Dr. Cuyler placed in Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church Brooklyn (of which he was the founder and pastor for thirty years), a beautiful memorial window to his mother, representing Hannah and her child Samuel, and the fitting inscription: "As long as he liveth I have lent him to the Lord."

How London's Poor Live*

THE Carter, with his clean-cut face, chin beard and shaved upper lip, I should have taken in the United States for anything from a master workman to a well-to-do farmer. The Carpenter—well, I should have taken him for a carpenter. He looked it, lean and wiry, with shrewd, observant eyes, and hands that had grown twisted to the handles of tools through forty-seven years' work at the trade. The chief difficulty with these men was that they were old, and that their children, instead of growing up to take care of them, had died. Their years had told on them, and they had been forced out of the whirl of industry by the younger and stronger competitors who had taken their places.

These two men, turned away from the casual ward of Whitechapel Workhouse, were bound with me for Poplar Workhouse. Not much of a show, they thought, but to chance it was all that remained to us. It was Poplar, or the streets and night. Both men were anxious for a bed, for they were "about gone," as they phrased it. The Carter, fifty-eight years of age, had spent the last three nights without shelter or sleep, while the Carpenter, sixty-five years of age, had been out five nights.

But, O dear, soft people, full of meat and blood, with white beds and airy rooms waiting you each night, how can I make you know what it is to suffer, as you would suffer, if you spent a weary night on London's streets. Believe me, you would think a thousand centuries had come and gone, before the East paled into dawn; you would shiver until you were ready to cry aloud with the pain of each aching muscle; and you would marvel that you could endure so much and live. Should you rest upon a bench, and your tired eyes close, depend upon it, the policeman would rouse you and gruffly order you to "move on." You may rest upon the bench, and benches are few and far between; but if rest means sleep, on you must go, dragging your tired body through the endless streets. Should you, in desperate slyness, seek some forlorn alley or dark passageway and lie down, the omnipresent policeman will rout you out just the same. It is his business to rout you out. It is a law of the powers that be, that you shall be routed out.

But when the dawn came, the nightmare over, you would hale your home to refresh yourself, and until you died you would tell the story of your adventure to groups of admiring friends. It would grow into a mighty story. Your little eight-hour night would become an Odyssey, and you a Homer.

Not so with these homeless ones who walked to Poplar Workhouse with me. And there are thirty-five thousand of them, men and women, in London town this night. Please don't remember it as you go to bed; if you are as soft as you ought to be, you may not rest so well as usual. But for old men of sixty, seventy, and eighty, ill-fed, with neither meat nor blood, to greet the dawn unrefreshed, and to stagger through the day in mad search for crusts, with relentless night rushing down upon them again, and to do this five nights and days. O, dear, soft people, full of meat and blood, how can you ever understand?

Mile-End Road is a wide thoroughfare, cutting the heart of East London, and there were tens of thousands of people abroad on it. I tell you this that you may fully appreciate what I shall describe in the next paragraph.

The Carter was hard put to keep the pace at which we walked (he told me that he had eaten nothing that day), but the Carpenter, lean and hungry, his gray and ragged overcoat flapping mournfully in the breeze, swung on in a long and tireless stride, which reminded me strongly of the plains coyote. Both kept their eyes upon the pavement as they walked and talked, and every now and then one or the other would stoop and pick something up, never missing the stride the while. I thought it was cigar and cigarette stumps they were collecting, and for some time took no notice. Then I did notice.

From the slimy sidewalk they were picking up bits of orange-peel, apple-skin, and grape-stems, and they were eating them. The pits of green gage plums they cracked between their teeth for the kernels inside. They picked up stray crumbs of bread the size of peas, apple cores so black and dirty one would not take them to be apple cores, and these things these two men took into their mouths, and chewed them, and swallowed them; and this, between six and seven o'clock in the evening of August 20, year of our Lord 1902, in the heart of the greatest, wealthiest and most powerful empire the world has ever seen.

*From The People of the Abyss, by Jack London. A volume in which the author relates his experience in the "underworld" of London in 1902, where he explored and lived among the very poor and the hosts of the unemployed and the hungry. A strange, weird book, written in the strong, graphic style which has already made this young author famous. Illustrated with many photographs. Pp. 319, cloth binding. Price $2. The Macmillan Co., London and New York, publishers.

A Fight for the City

MR. HODDER'S book, A Fight for the City, is a brief account of the municipal campaign in New York, in 1901. The book is cleverly made up by putting together selected speeches of Judge Jerome, who was the citizens' candidate for District Attorney. There is, therefore, not much of Mr. Hodder in the book, but a great deal of Judge Jerome. The selections are made with good judgment; there is very little repetition, and the arrangement of topics is such, as, in a sense, to make the book a connected argument from beginning to end in behalf of an improved municipal government. Judge Jerome's appearance in the canvass was marked from the start by great boldness of statement, and the direct and specific attack made by him on different forms of vice, proved to be the best method of attracting the attention of voters. The attractive personality of the speaker is very clearly brought out by the quotations from his addresses; and the very indiscretion of many of his utterances, and the obvious fact that many things he said were said on the impulse of the moment, had great effect upon his audiences, and add greatly to the readable and interesting character of the book. The book is one which the reader will not lay down until he has finished it, and which throws a vivid light upon the conditions of life among the poor, which prevailed in some parts of the city of New York. The price of the book is $1.50. Macmillan & Co., New York, publishers.

Ivers & Pond PIANOS

A PIANO FOR XMAS.

Surely nothing can make a more acceptable or appropriate Xmas gift than a beautiful Ivers & Pond piano. If you will write us at once we will send you our handsome new catalogue, just off the press, containing half-tone pictures of our 1904 styles, and will also give you full information as to how one of these charming instruments can be placed in your home before Christmas, even though you live in the most distant part of the United States. Ivers & Pond pianos, from a musical and artistic standpoint, cannot be excelled. No amount of money could buy any better materials or workmanship, richer or more musical tone, or greater durability.

HOW TO BUY.

If no dealer near you sells them we can supply you from Boston. An order entrusted to us will be executed with the nicest discrimination in regard to tone quality, perfection of action and beauty of case finish that would be exercised were the piano to be for the personal use of one of our officers. The wisdom of this care on our part is obvious when we willingly ship the piano subject to approval, not asking that it be accepted unless it proves entirely satisfactory. We sell on time payments (in the most remote village or city in the United States as simply and safely as if you lived in Boston), requiring a small cash remittance at time of purchase, and balance in 12, 24 or 36 equal monthly payments. Old pianos taken in exchange. A personal letter with list of cash and time prices if you will write.

OUR HOME MUSIC CLASS

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON X.

Formation of Keys.—Up to this point we have been learning to sing in different keys and becoming familiar with their representation on the staff, but with no fuller explanation of them than the bare statement that with a certain signature the staff represents a certain key and that Do is on a certain degree. We may now learn some of the reasons for these things.

In the course of our lessons we have learned that the scale is a series of eight tones, that each tone differs from the others in pitch, also in character or mental effect. Going further, we may now learn that the most important tone of the scale, the central or chief tone, is called the Keytone or Keynote. The tones of a scale are also called a key, but a distinction is made between a key and a scale. A key is a family of tones consisting of a keytone and six related tones, together with all their octaves above and below. A scale is simply the tones of a key arranged in successive order, ascending or descending, beginning with the keytone and ending with its octave.

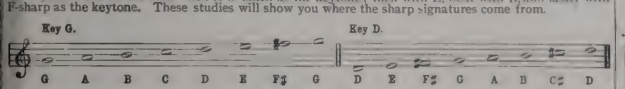
We already know that the scale has no fixed place in pitch; any point in pitch may be taken as the keytone or starting point of the scale. Thus we may begin the scale with the pitch D, or F, or A, or at any other point. A key or scale is named from the name of the pitch taken as the keytone. From among the various keys there is one that is taken as the central key of the whole system—as the standard from which all the others are to be reckoned. This particular scale is the one that begins with C, the one that is produced by playing the white keys of the piano or organ. When any other pitch than C is taken as the keytone the voice will naturally sing certain new pitches in place of certain old ones, and the degrees of the staff that represent these old pitches must be changed and made to represent the new ones.

Illustration.—Play, or get a friend to play for you, the white keys of the organ or piano, beginning with C and ending with its octave. This you will recognize as the scale of C. It corresponds with the scale produced by your voice when you take the pitch C as Do. It consists of the pitches C, D, E, F, G, A, B, C. These pitches are represented by the natural degrees of the staff, with a clef. See example 45, in Lesson IX.

Next, take G as the starting point and play the scale, and you will notice that instead of the white key F, you must play the black key next above it, known as F-sharp, in order to make the scale sound right, to make it correspond to the scale as you would sing it. This will show you that the scale of G consists of the pitches G, A, B, C, D, E, F-sharp, G. Now, in order to make the staff represent the pitches of the scale of G, the degree that represents F must be made to represent F-sharp. This is done by putting a sharp upon it. See example Key G.

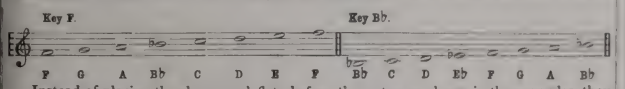
Again, taking D as the keytone, you will observe that to make the scale sound as you would naturally sing it, you must skip the white keys F and C, and play instead the black keys F-sharp and C-sharp. To represent the scale of D on the staff you must change the degrees that represent F and C and make them represent F-sharp and C-sharp. See example Key D.

Now, from the above illustrations you ought to be able to find out what changes are to be made on the keyboard and on the staff when A is taken as the keytone; then with E, next with B, and lastly with F-sharp as the keytone. These studies will show you where the sharp signatures come from.



Let us next find out the origin of the flat signatures. First, we must know that the black keys of the instrument are called both "sharp" and "flat." When a black key takes the place of the white one next below it is called "sharp;" when it takes the place of the white one next above it is called "flat." Taking F as the starting point of the scale, you will find that instead of the white key B, you must play the black key next below, B-flat, in order to make the scale sound as you would sing it. To represent the scale of F on staff you must put a flat on the degree that represents B and make it represent B-flat. See example Key F. The key next in succession begins on B-flat. You will find that instead of E you must play E-flat to make the scale correct, and to represent it on the staff you must put flats on the degrees that represent B and E and make them represent B-flat and E-flat. See example Key B-flat.

Now, proceed to find out the changes that are necessary on the keyboard and on the staff with E-flat as the keytone; then with A-flat; next with D-flat, and finally with G-flat as the starting point of the scale. These studies will show you where the flat signatures come from.



Instead of placing the sharps and flats before the notes, as shown in the examples, they are gathered into a group at one point and thus become the "sign of the key" or signatures as we already know. According to common usage, a sharp or flat in a signature affects not only the degree on which it is placed, but also all its octaves on the same staff.

The Mormon Senator

Several hundred petitions have been presented to the United States Senate against the admission of the Mormon "Apostle" Reed Smoot, who has been elected Senator from Utah. Some of them come from organized societies, and others are signed by individuals in all parts of the country. They have been referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which will decide whether there is anything in Mr. Smoot's record that would operate as a legal bar against his admission to the Senate. Senator Hoar, in presenting some of these petitions on November 11, said that he did so as a matter of courtesy, and the petitions would not have the effect the signers hoped. The question whether a man was entitled to a seat in the Senate, he pointed out, was a purely judicial one, which would be determined by the Senate under the Constitution and laws of the United States. It, therefore, seemed to him as much out of place to present such petitions in the Senate, as it would be to petition the Supreme Court to take up out of order some certain case on its docket, or to decide that case in some particular way.

ty-eight years of age; "what nonsense! I knew the Smiths in their palmy days, and let me tell you there are very few young ladies of the present day who can at all compare with Mary Smith. Why have you dropped her, my dear?" turning to his wife, who was nearly eighteen years his junior, "she ought to be invited. Nothing would suit me better. The Howards remember her very well, and so do the Sharps. Judge Sharp was speaking of her just the other day. If you have made a mistake of this kind, I say it is a good one—one of the mistakes that Providence has a hand in."

This was a great deal for Mr. Montague to say, and it gave a thoughtful turn to the discussion. If papa considered little Miss Smith all right, of course she was, and one and all agreed that, on no account, must she ever be allowed to know there had ever been a mistake; but should their surmises be correct, she was to be treated as an old friend, and with special consideration.

I presume Fluff must have whispered it abroad, being the only little bird in the secret, but before Thanksgiving Day dawned, almost every one in Riverdale knew that little Miss Smith had been invited out to dinner to the Montagues in the city, and treated her with a new kind of respect. And in what a glorious state of excitement she was, to be sure, when she took the Oak Street car into the city Thursday morning. She had the air of a well-dressed lady, too, if her silk gown was a dozen years old, for she wore the gold watch that had been her mother's wedding present, and the pair of lilac kid gloves that she kept for great occasions.

She was received with distinguished courtesy, especially by old Mr. Montague, who had many reminiscences of the old days, when he and her father, the Judge, were well acquainted, to talk over, and as she was recognized and remembered by this one and that one of the company, the sparkle returned to her eye, the music to her voice, and her tongue was loosened, pouring forth a continual stream of wit and intelligence, for which she had once been greatly noted. Judge Sharp, a cotemporary of her father's, engaged her in an animated conversation, and, remembering her once rare accomplishments, would have her sit at the piano, and revive the songs of long ago. In fact, it was a merry, jovial, genial day with all; little Miss Smith enjoyed it no more than the rest. Indeed, Judge Sharp was so delighted over the revival of this old acquaintance, that he, then and there, without consulting his wife, invited her to eat Christmas dinner with them. I suppose Riverdale never had a more thankful heart than little Miss Smith's that night. She was so happy that she kept breaking out in hymns to that extent as to surprise Fluff into an ecstacy.

A few days after, as Isabel Montague and her father stood by the window of their residence, the splendid coach from Riverdale Heights rolled by. In it was a single occupant, a rather plain girl, wearing a spoiled air of pride and luxury.

"There, papa," said Isabel, "is the Miss Mary Smith we really invited to our Thanksgiving dinner. They say she is heiress to more than a million."

The old gentleman looked at her as she passed, then putting up his glasses, he said emphatically, "I wouldn't give our Mary Smith for a dozen of her. What if she is worth a million? Our Mary is worth her weight in gold; and, what is more to the purpose, she has for her Father the King of Glory, too."

Brain Workers Should Drink

HORLICK'S MALTED MILK

It forms a delicious table beverage that is more healthful than tea, coffee or cocoa. Very nutritious, easily digested, and invigorating to the nervous and digestive systems. Helpful in dyspepsia and impaired digestion. Taken hot upon retiring it induces restful sleep.

Horlick's Malted Milk is pure, rich milk, with an extract of choice malted grain, partially predigested, and concentrated to powder. Instantly prepared by stirring in hot or cold water. Complete in itself and needs no further cooking or addition of milk.

In tablet form, also, to be dissolved in the mouth. They make a convenient, satisfying office luncheon.

Hotels, Clubs, Restaurants serve Horlick's Malted Milk.

☞ Our product is imitated; ask for Horlick's.

All Druggists Sell It.

Sample of powder or tablet form, or both, will be sent free upon request.

CAMPING IN THE RUINS OF THEIR HOME

It was here, near the sea-coast, that Don Juan d'Esquival, the first Spanish Governor of Jamaica, founded the first capital of the island, Seville Nueva, or Seville d'Oro, as it was afterwards called, he having been sent over and commissioned by Diego Columbus (Christopher's son) to establish a colony there. Seville Nueva contained many buildings worthy of note, amongst which were a monastery and cathedral. The pavement of the latter extended to a distance of two miles. There were also many palaces. As the island is extremely mountainous, a great diversity of climate is obtainable, from a tropical temperature of 85 or 90 at the seacoast, down to 75 at a medium altitude, and on the tops of the highest mountains as low as 50 degrees. Dryness of atmosphere renders the climate of Jamaica particularly delightful and suitable to the most delicate constitutions. At night the air becomes cool, insomuch that precautions are necessary in the matter of clothing, in making excursions from the atmosphere below, to the salutary climate of the hills. Another advantage which Jamaica derives from its peculiar inequality of surface is the nocturnal land wind. As soon as the breeze, blowing from the east, dies away in the evening, the hot air of the plains ascends towards the summits of the mountains, and is there condensed by the cold; which, making it specifically heavier than it was before, it descends back to the plains on both sides of the ridge, keeping the nights cool and pleasant.

REV. GEORGE HOUSE

Approaching the southern shore the predominant features are more bold and beautiful. There the traveler is first struck by the stupendous and soaring ridges of the Blue Mountains, showing abrupt precipices or inaccessible cliffs; but on a nearer approach these rugged appearances seem improved by an interposition of cultivated spots, where the hand of diligence has awakened life and fertility. Beneath are the savannahs, extensively covered with cultivations—cane fields, bananas, and an abundance of other products.

In the terrific cyclone which swept the island on August 11, tremendous damage was done. Pastor George House, of St. Ann's Bay, who is now in this country, is one of the many missionaries who has suffered through the hurricane. The losses of the various religious denominations in buildings destroyed by the cyclone were as follows: Baptists $75,000, Episcopalians $75,000, Wesleyans $65,000, Presbyterians $25,000, Congregationalists $7,500, smaller bodies $5,000; a total of $252,500. Besides these, 170 schoolhouses were destroyed, and about 10,000 dwellings and other buildings. These churches mentioned above are now homeless. The people are without a place in which to worship. This aggravates the general suffering. The cyclone has temporarily ruined the country. Towns and villages were strewn with debris and the peasantry are in fearful circumstances. Thousands of people have been left homeless, their houses transformed into a heap of refuse, and before them stand destroyed plantations, which once formed their means of livelihood. The destruction of plantations, great and small, cuts off for many months the means of living.

In our Thanksgiving let us remember these fellow Christians in their distress. Even a little gift to aid the poor and the hungry would be greatly appreciated. It may be said of Jamaica to-day, that it is a land without a "thanksgiving"—that is, they have no thanksgiving for matured crops, for just as the harvests of spice, coffee, and bananas were to be gathered in, they were snatched ruthlessly away by the tempest. Yet the prevailing note heard on all sides is one of thankfulness, for lives that have been saved in the midst of many dangers.

Readers of this journal, who are disposed to aid the suffering Jamaicans, can forward their gifts of money to the Nova Scotia Bank, Sears' Building, Washington street, Boston, Mass., to the credit of Rev. D. McKillop, Treasurer of the Mandeville (Keswick) Convention, Jamaica, West Indies, which represents the interests of all the churches. Such contributions will be distributed by the Convention Council, in proportion to the needs of the districts. Donations of light summer clothing, suitable for wear in the West Indies, may be sent to the Baptist City Mission, 102 Second avenue, New York City, and they will be forwarded to Jamaica. Many of the people are absolutely in need, and such clothing will be very welcome. All gifts will be duly acknowledged.

Any further information, respecting Jamaica and its needs, may be obtained from Pastors Geo. House, G. E. Henderson, or G. H. Lea, who may be addressed at the Medical Missionary Institute, No. 288 Lexington avenue, New York City.

Hearty Acknowledgment

I have received The Speaking Oak. I think it has its right name. It is nice for all the family to read and it has a good influence.

The "Art Gallery" is beautiful. Each one of the presents is a gem. I hope I will always be able to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is the best Christian paper I know of. MRS. WM. FRY.

"Oneida Community Quality"

FOR GIFTS.

The silver-plated ware that looks like sterling silver is marked

ONEIDA COMMUNITY

Look for this mark and protect yourself.

It is like sterling silver in that the patterns are clear and sharp, with fine line detail, and high ornaments.

It is finished like sterling ware either in the bright or in the rich French Gray effect, which brings out to best advantage the workmanship of these beautiful designs.

Like sterling ware, it is sold and passed in family wants from one generation to another.

It is next to sterling silver in its wearing qualities, and is the equal in appearance of any sterling silver plate. It is the first time the genuine value in the piece of silver is recognized by a manufacturer. We manufacture at the present low price at which we could afford to put it on to plated ware having—that we could put on enough to make it wear for generations a fair time, and that keeps the price down to bear the shipping charge of the finished article to your home. This is what we mean by "Triple plate." All our silverware has a "triple plate" and is guaranteed for 25 years.

In other words, "Oneida Community Quality" means triple plate, pieces guaranteed for 25 years, and a finish of the best that is guaranteed for 100 years and is sold at the price of ordinary plate.

MY SHEPHERD

MY Shepherd is the Lord, the King,
I cannot want the smallest thing;
He gives me rest in pastures green,
Where pure and limpid brooks are seen.
He leadeth me, and doth restore
My soul when faint from trials sore;
In righteous paths he leads me on,
For his own sake, till heaven is won.

In death's dark shade I will not fear,
Jesus, my Friend, will then be near;
His rod and staff my stay shall be,
Till morn shall break and shadows flee.
A bounteous feast he doth provide,
'Mid enemies on every side;
My cup he fills from heaven's own font,
O'erflowing; filling every want.

His goodness and his mercy, too,
Shall follow all my journey thro';
Assured I am he'll ne'er forsake,
Till in his presence I awake
In his own likeness—satisfied.
And while eternal ages glide,
Within my Father's house above
I'll ever dwell and share his love.

ARTISTIC MONUMENTS

Cost No More than Plain Ones in White Bronze

Marble is entirely out of date.
Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted customers in all parts of the country. Many granite dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information, stating about what expense you anticipate. It puts you under no obligations. We deal direct and deliver everywhere.

A Chinese Heathen Feast

THE Feast of Devils was elaborately celebrated in Penang lately, says The Penang Herald. Numerous tables were to be seen in the street, and upon these were rows of platters and deep bowls of food, also family idols and incense burners. Smouldering joss sticks protruded from each dainty dish, groaning with cakes, fruits and meat. There were only three kinds of meat proper, goat's flesh, mutton and pork. "Devils cannot eat flesh bulls." Noticeable were large quantities of dried prawns and various kinds of salt fish. Thousands of ducks and chickens must have been boiled whole—the combs of the cocks were red with cochineal, and their beaks open as if crowing! The hen's heads were in easy attitudes, as if sitting on nests. Fine geese, white and tender, were much in evidence. Countless cakes of every color under heaven, save only white and blue (white is deep mourning and blue secondary mourning), were heaped up everywhere. Sunset yellow and "nigger red" predominated. Thirty-five kinds of fruit figured in all. There were watermelons, turkey red and pitifully wilted. They and some green (ripe) apples hailed from Australia; China furnished pears, ly-chees and yellow rind oranges; also pumpkins and large and rosy persimmons. Tampines, cat's eyes, "birway" and "buah salak" represented the Malay Peninsula. "Tampine" is about the size of a small turnip and brown as a nut. "Cat's eyes" are a tropical variety of ly-chee. "Birway" is a fruit with white pulp. The seed is unique; it is covered with what might be called a sort of "forked excelsior." Salak means "wicked."

The traditional belief is that thousands of unfortunate Chinese who die destitute, and who have been huddled to their graves with barely any covering on them, return at this season of the year in the shape of spirits, and seek to take vengeance on their fellow creatures who had treated their remains with such scant respect. And woe betide the unfortunate wretches who dare to look askance at these spirits, or who neglect the paramount duty, which is incumbent upon them, of making atonement for their neglect in the past.

The Benefit of Revivals

The following impressive testimony to the permanent result of revivals, in supplying the church not only with converts but with earnest workers, was given recently by Dr. R. E. Torrey: "Everywhere we have gone in our tour around the world, very many of the most successful workers that we have met, both in foreign mission fields and in the home churches, told me that they were converted under D. L. Moody. If we should take out of the church and philanthropic life of Great Britain and Ireland all who were converted in the Moody and Sankey revival meetings, what a tremendous gap would be left! The minister who holds aloof from a true evangelistic movement in a city or town will do so to the great detriment of his own spiritual life, and to the great harm of the church over which he presides."

Do You Wish This Beautiful Calendar?

Rarely, if ever, has a calendar been issued that can compare with our Superb Drop-Leaf Butterfly Calendar for 1904 and 1905. The best artists known were engaged to reproduce in all their Natural Brilliancy and Richness of Coloring a series of Tropical and Semi-Tropical Butterflies, and The Forbes Lithograph Company had the original butterflies continually at hand, to enable them, step by step, to compare their work with nature's product.

★ ★ ★ ★

They have marvelously succeeded in accurately reproducing all the delicate tracings, and never was more perfect work issued from any lithographic press. Four Lovely Children's Faces lend additional grace and beauty to this Art Production, which covers a space, when unfolded, of 10½ by 29 inches, or over 300 Square Inches, and supplies the calendar for Two Whole Years. This Artistic Gem will beautify many a home during the coming two years.

★ ★ ★ ★

Fifteen Printings were required to bring the work to the high standard which The Christian Herald always demands, and on which its enviable reputation for superior work has been established. This Calendar goes Free, postage prepaid, with every subscription.

"Father of Greater New York"

The Late Andrew H. Green and His Remarkable Public Career

ALL classes of people in New York City and throughout the State were shocked by the news of the death of the Hon. Andrew Haswell Green, who was shot down by an insane negro, on the steps of his residence at No. 91 Park avenue, on November 13. Mr. Green had long been a well-known and greatly-respected citizen of the metropolis, where he had held many positions of honor and high responsibility.

Mr. Green came of an old New England family, and was born at Green Hill, Worcester, Mass., in 1820. On reaching manhood, and after a period of travel, he entered the law office of Samuel J. Tilden, and afterwards became Mr. Tilden's partner. His public career began when he became a school trustee in 1854, and from that time forward, his peculiar aptitude for large public undertakings seems to have become pronounced and recognized. In 1856 he was appointed a Commissioner of Central Park, and it may be said in brief that to his foresight, his broad and intelligent comprehension of New York's needs, and his tireless industry is due very largely the development of Central Park and of other parks throughout the State as well. He assisted materially in the movement for the purchase of Niagara Park by the State as a public reservation, saving it from destruction by vandals. His was the leading influence in the organization of the Astor-Lennox-Tilden public library. He was the city's Comptroller during the stormy years that followed the municipal revolution of 1872, and the citizens had such a warm appreciation of his sterling character that they dubbed him "the watchdog of the treasury."

In 1896, he projected the great and far-reaching scheme which won him the distinguished title of "Father of Greater New York." It was his far-seeing and active brain which first suggested the desirability of uniting the metropolis and its outlying suburbs in one grand municipality. He was made President of the Greater New York Commission, and advocated the project ceaselessly thereafter, until it became an accomplished fact. Had he so wished, he might have been the first mayor of the greater city; but he had no desire for personal glorification, and resisted all temptations to enter the tempestuous sea of local politics. In 1898, a special gold medal was struck and presented to Mr. Green, commemorating the consolidation of the municipalities, and expressing the esteem of the people of the metropolis for "the Father of Greater New York."

Mr. Green's activities were not confined to his pet project, however. He was identified with almost every movement for the welfare and advancement of the city and its population, and especially during the last two decades. He had no taste for practical politics, but he never hesitated to spend his time and his energies where there was a possibility of helping his fellowmen to cleaner, brighter and happier lives. He was a member of nearly a score of historical, philanthropic, botanical, patriotic, geographical and other societies, to each of which he gave scrupulous attention in the interest of public service.

Privately, he was a man of many charities and had a host of pensioners dependent upon his bounty. He was also warmly interested in religious work, and took an active and practical share in the support of domestic and foreign missions. Indeed, it can be truthfully said that he left no opportunity unimproved to do good to his fellows. He was an ideal Christian citizen, and for nearly half of his long and busy lifetime, he has lived for others almost wholly, planning and working for the general good and employing body and brain ceaselessly for that purpose.

New York City and the State unite in mourning the loss of one who has done so much to win the love and esteem of the people, and whose distinguished services to the commonwealth have placed his fellowmen under obligations that cannot be repaid by imposing demonstrations, eloquent tributes or monuments of stone. His name has become imperishably known as that of the good citizen who during his whole career strove, under Divine guidance, to lead men into purer, better and nobler lives.

A Mammoth Issue

Our readers will observe that the present issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD consists of 44 pages. It contains more reading matter of general interest (wholly apart from advertisements), than any issue of the paper ever before published.

DRAWN BY LOVE DIVINE

MRS. CARRIE T. MOORE, Superintendent of the Florence Crittenton Home, Minneapolis, Minn., has sent this beautiful incident to Dr. Klopsch for publication:

"The sheriff of a town in Minnesota wrote me asking if I would take a girl from there who had been in jail for the death of her illegitimate child. She was not guilty, and was acquitted. I took her into our Home. She was very unhappy, thinking of her child, whom she declared she loved and would have worked for. After a time, I got her a place to work; first acquainting the lady with the facts. She took the girl, and the latter came to our Home on Sundays to meeting. She left her place after a time and got other work.

"One day she came to the Home and told me she was helping in a Swedish mission, visiting the poor and taking food to the hungry. From her talk, I found she was doing a good work. She had bought a new hat, and afterwards she felt sorry, as the money, she said, would have done someone good.

"I asked her what made so great a change in her, for she looked so bright and happy. She replied, 'One Sunday afternoon I came to the Home to meeting, and brought my employer's little boy with me. Mrs. A did not know I was going so far. Going back, I took a car going the wrong way, so that I did not get home until late. They were worried about the child, and they scolded me so that I cried. I felt so bad that I went to my room, and there I picked up a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Looking at it, I read the words, 'God so loved the world,' and I thought, Well, if he loves the world, then he loves me. I got right down upon my knees and prayed. I got up so happy and I have been so happy ever since. I do not get angry any more, no matter what anyone says to me. I am happy all the time.'

"This is the story of a simple girl, who found salvation through the Gospel message in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

RELIANCE

A bank president wheeled in his chair the other day and said, "Make me out one of those RELIANCE policies for $100,000." He was a wise banker. We like to deal with bankers. They know so much about capital and surplus and wise management and enter into an insurance transaction with what might be termed "the judicial spirit." We also like to deal with sensible people who are not bankers. Would you not like to get in touch with us by mail? If we cannot be of service to you, we promise to change our plans or strike our flag.

Deafness Overcome

Louisville Man Originates a Simple Little Device that Instantly Restores the Hearing—Fits Perfectly, Comfortably and Does Not Show.

190-PAGE BOOK FREE TELLS ALL ABOUT IT

Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any such old fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf, and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is effective even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and, aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness in any person no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190 page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bonafide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station in life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc. and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device; you will find among them the names of people in your own town or state, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address for the free book and convincing evidence, Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1310 Todd building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Etter, Va. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in hearing and answering prayers."

B. B., Ironton, O. "I prayed to God for a certain thing. Thank God, my prayers were answered."

Reader, Philadelphia. "I was in great trouble. I went to God in prayer. He heard and answered. Praise his Holy name."

A. R. K., Washington, D. C. "Many times have my prayers been answered. The Lord is an ever present help in time of need."

Mrs. J. R. C., Eckford, Mich. "I know God hears and answers our prayers, if we come to him in an acceptable way."

In His Name, Martinsburg, Pa. "Have faith in God. He has wonderfully blessed me in answer to prayer. Praise his Holy name."

E. A., Rutherford, N. J. "I feel constrained to thankfully acknowledge God's many answers to my prayers in time of trouble."

J. M., East Poultney, Vt. "I wish to add my name to the list of those who believe in special answer to prayer."

Miss B. L., Gainesville, Fla. "In times of great distress, God heard my prayers and answered them. I will ever love and praise him."

Mrs. M. B., McVille, N. Y. "I want to acknowledge God's power in answering prayer for me in many ways."

Reader, Dak. "I am very thankful for answered prayers. I was in great trouble and sought the Lord in earnest prayer. He was my deliverer."

N. J. A., Philadelphia, Pa. "I am now sixty-five years old and have been trusting in God for twenty years. He has never failed to answer my prayers. Bless his holy name!"

A Friend, Wilmington, Ohio. "I have been for the last forty years of my life abundantly blessed in answer to prayer. I feel that I want to pray without ceasing, and in all things give thanks."

A Believer in Prayer, Cooksville, Ill. "I wish to acknowledge God's mercy in answering my prayer. He has answered many prayers for me. I praise his holy name."

Reader, Minneapolis, Minn. "I was in great sorrow and trouble, and took it all to God, and he answered my prayers in a way I little thought of. I thank him for it."

Reader, Tifton, Ga. "Many times God has answered my prayers. I know that when I pray, I am to receive what I ask for, because Christ said, 'If ye shall ask anything in my name, I will do it.'"

W. J. K., Collinston, Utah. "I desire to add my testimony to those who are witnessing to the faithfulness of our Heavenly Father in answering the prayers of his children."

Believer in Prayer, Kansas. "I promised the Lord if he would answer my prayer I would acknowledge it to the world. He has heard. Praise his name."

D. M. J., Iowa. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering prayer. He has done so in many wonderful ways, sometimes quite unexpectedly, and I feel that I shall never doubt him again."

F. E., Cal. "I praise God that he many times has answered my prayers. Often when I was cast down he comforted me. Prayers for the salvation of others have been answered in his own way."

Reader, Troy, D. C. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of our Heavenly Father in answering prayer. He has relieved me when in great trouble and sorrow. He will always relieve us if we come to him in faith believing."

Reader, Sparland, Ill. "I have been greatly strengthened by reading of so many that have such faith in God. I know that God has answered my prayers, and know that he will answer prayer if we only trust him."

Miss L. H., New York. "I have been reading the Answered Prayers, and I feel that I must write and say that I know God does hear and answer prayer. He has heard and answered me a great many times. I want to thank him for all he has done for me."

Constant Reader, Ashland, Pa. "Mother wishes to join me in acknowledging the goodness of our heavenly Father in answering prayer. God has answered our prayer many times—yea, every time—both in regard to our temporal and spiritual welfare. When the way seems so dark 'a little talk with Jesus makes it right.'"

Hopeful, Weaubleau, Mo. "Through a misunderstanding, my dearest friend became my bitter enemy. After doing everything in my power to make it right, and only making matters worse, I began praying. One day, while lying on my bed grieving over it, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was brought in, and my eye fell on the Answered Prayers. It gave me faith, and in tears I begged God to melt her heart toward me, and before night she sent me a kind letter of reconciliation. Was it not God's answer?"

A Reader, New York. "I have long been in the habit of trying to pray as best I could for the members of my Bible Class, for my fellow Christians in the little church that I attend, and for many dear friends and kinsfolk. I name them at the mercy seat one by one, though not always all in one day, and crave for them the same blessings of guardianship, comfort and guidance, that I am wont to ask for myself. As I see their lives, many of them at least, brightening more and more with blessings, temporal and spiritual, I ask myself in solemn wonder, 'Is this due in the least to my poor prayers?' I dare believe that in some degree at least it is, and I write this in hope of encouraging others to persevere in the ministry of intercession."

An "Old Pilgrim's" Choice

Mrs. C. A. B., Bone Gap, Ill., writes: "I send in my renewal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I want the Morrison book for the children to read nights. I am old, and nearly blind, but the children can read to me most of the paper, and as a premium, you may send How I Worked my Way Around the World. You may put me down as one of the old pilgrims. I was born in 1817, have been living a Christian life since my early teens, and am not tired of that kind of life yet. I was eighty-six the tenth of last May."

ENGLAND'S AMBASSADOR

HOW much greater importance than formerly is attached to diplomatic relations with the United States by the British Government, is seen in the selection of a representative to succeed the late Sir Michael Herbert. For the first time, a trained diplomatist of the highest rank is chosen for the position. He is Sir Henry Mortimer Durand, now British Ambassador at the court of Spain. He is fifty-three years of age, and has held many important offices. Following the example of his father, Major-General Durand, he entered the India service, about thirty years ago. He served under Lord Roberts as Political Secretary during the Afghan troubles of 1879, and on his return was appointed to a responsible office in the India Government. When the Marquis of Dufferin went to Cabul to negotiate with the Ameer, Sir Mortimer Durand accompanied him, and again in 1893 he conducted a difficult business with the Afghans, which won him high commendation from the British Government. In the following year he was appointed British Minister at the Persian court, where he remained until 1900, when he was appointed Ambassador to Madrid. The change to Washington is announced as a promotion, and there is no doubt that it will call for higher qualities than were required at the Spanish court. The cordial relations now happily existing between the two governments will, however, render the position a pleasant one. Those who know Sir Mortimer predict that he will be popular in Washington society. He is the author of two books which have had a large circulation in England, and has edited his father's history of the Afghan war.

SIR HENRY MORTIMER DURAND

Hearts Touched in Cuba

FROM the founder of El Faro Christiano (the Gospel Lighthouse) Mission in Juraco, Cuba, we have received the following letter, which speaks most encouragingly of the Mission's work:

"My Dear Mr. Klopsch:—Accept our grateful thanks for the kind donation which we have just received through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We are praying to extend our work in Cuba. There are many towns without the Gospel, when each one should have some exponent here. But we quietly wait God's good time in all things, both as to workers and funds. We could now profitably take one dozen new workers to learn the language and the customs of the people.

"A good evangelistic friend of mine in England once said that if God did not give him converts, he always left the place and went to another. We feel a good deal the same way about it, but we can praise the name of the Lord that we have been able to preach the Gospel in some fifty towns, and we thank him that he has not kept us waiting for years to see the tokens of his love, but has turned many to himself during our brief occupation of this part of Cuba. Hundreds of urgent calls have been put forth, and who can tell how deep the messages have sunk into the hearts of many who to us may appear shallow? When we remember the expectation and the actual results amongst the Chinese, we may well withhold judgment, and work on in quiet confidence in God.

"In one little Cuba home, about a year ago, the three occupants—a dear old lady and her two blind daughters—gladly accepted the Gospel when first presented to them. They have been El Faro Christianos (Christian Lighthouses) in their neighborhood ever since. The mother is over eighty. Her prayers and ours have been that her daughters might have sight before she left them to be seen of men no more. A few days ago we received the intelligence that one of the sisters is now so much improved that she can see to pick up a pin from the floor. The old mother is intensely happy and triumphant.

"J. B. W."

Delighted with Red Letter Bible

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I have received the Red Letter Bible, and to say I was surprised to receive such a beautiful book does not half express it. It surpasses my highest expectation. It is simply immense. The wonder is how you can give so much for so little money. Many of my friends have seen the book, and feel, as I do, that it is wonderful. I can read the print so easily that I read eighteen chapters without stopping, the very first thing after I received it. I thank you most sincerely for the book, and hope you may live many years in which to continue your good work. MRS. ADDIE R. CATHCART.

WONDERFUL UNDERWEAR.

A New Method of Knitting That Cuts the Price of Underwear in Two.

A new style of underwear, made by a new process, is now noticeable in the stores. It is called Utica Ribbed Fleece, because of the peculiar formation of its fabric, and is having a widespread sale by reason of its surprising comfort and economy.

A slight examination of a suit of Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear—which sells for fifty cents a garment—will show that it is equal in every respect to a suit of underwear that formerly cost a much larger sum.

This remarkable benefit is due to the invention of a wonderful knitting machine, which knits automatically a fabric, one side of which is composed of elastic ribs and the other side of downy fleece. Hence the name, Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear.

The elasticity of this peculiar weave is so perfect that the garment can be stretched to nearly twice its usual size. This causes it to fit the form closely, and especially adapts it for women's wear, while active men find that they are able to move much more easily in a Utica Ribbed Fleece garment.

The soft fléece will also retain its downy softness, and will not mat nor rumple. This is one of the remarkable features of the invention. In fact, the process is so complete that rough washing—so dangerous to underwear—will not shrink the fabric or change its shape.

The women's garments are close fitting, handsome, serviceable—a delight to the eye and sense of any woman. The men's wear is well made and comfortable. The price of both men's and women's garments is fifty cents.

For children, Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear is made in separate vests and pants, and also in union suits. The price per separate garment is twenty-five cents. The union suits are fifty cents each.

Utica Ribbed Fleece, the trade mark of the Utica Knitting Company, is sewed on every garment and marks it genuine.

WISDOM AND FRAILTY

Solomon in His Greatness and in His Fall

By Mrs. M. Baxter

PROBABLY no king who ever reigned has occupied a position so open to temptation as that of Solomon. From the truest point of view he was the greatest king that ever yet has reigned on earth, and he is the one type of Christ as King in his millennial glory (Ps. 72.) The Word of God has never said of any other king than Solomon that he "exceeded all the kings of the earth in riches and in wisdom." "And all the earth sought the presence of Solomon to hear his wisdom which God put in his heart" (I. Kings 10: 23, 24, R. V.). Such a position was enough to turn the head of any man; especially one who came to the throne so young, and stepped into such a position without having worked his way up to it as David had done. David was always, from first to last, conscious of his dependence upon God; Solomon began his reign in the same spirit, but did not continue, as his father had done, steadfast to the end. The results of the two lives shows how much more difficult is prosperity to a man of God than adversity.

Solomon began well, he lived in communion with God, and was not ashamed to confess before his people his allegiance to God. He was "strengthened in his kingdom, and the Lord his God was with him and magnified him exceedingly," and he on his part gathered together the representatives of his people to a solemn act of worship at Gibeon, about six or seven miles from Jerusalem, where the tabernacle which Moses made was standing (although the ark was then in Jerusalem), and there, upon the brazen altar of burnt-offering, the king offered "a thousand burnt-offerings" (II. Chron. 1: 1-6). It was an act of national homage and consecration, and God met his servant, for in that night did God appear unto Solomon, and said unto him, "Ask what I shall give thee." And Soloman said, "Give thy servant an understanding heart to judge this thy great people."

If Solomon had remained but a little child, he would never have departed from his God, as he did in his later years; and it was just this position of dependence which made it possible for God to put Solomon into such a unique position. The words of the young king pleased the Lord. How often God is obliged to refuse selfish prayers! And Solomon was equipped for service; he had God's word for it that wisdom was given him for the rule which was entrusted to him. Probably he felt no wiser than before, but he knew God was true, and that when occasion called for it the wisdom needed was there, made sure by the unfailing word of the living God.

Solomon's name means "peace." His reign was one of peace, and the temple worship prepared by David, and established by Solomon, was the figure and foundation of the worship which will be offered in Ezekiel's temple during the millennium (Ezek. 40: 46), when the glory which left the temple because of the people's sin (Ezek. 10: 4, 18, 19; 11: 22) shall return and make the very earth shine (Ezek. 43: 1-7). Then "the Prince of Peace" will reign; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2: 4).

The wisdom which God gave Solomon was of an exceptional character. His discernment in the case of the disputed maternity of the child, by which he discovered the true mother deeply impressed his people. All Israel heard of the judgment which the king had judged, and they feared the king; for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him to do judgment (ver. 28). But God gave him also an unprecedented intelligence in every branch of learning. "God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country and all the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all men" (I. Kings 4: 29-31). And this was not the result of excessive study. Even before his father died, Solomon reigned, and the multiplicity of things which have to be attended to at court, must have passed through his hands and precluded much study.

Home for Thanksgiving

BY the last of July the young sparrows are fledged. The white crowns are brown crowns until after the first moult, and in this head-dress they appear when they come to us with the old birds. All will be home in time for Thanksgiving, and, in our grounds at least, a fine spread shall be waiting—mince and pumpkin pie, cranberry sauce and the other things. Anything sweet or juicy, butter, preserves, cake—and, alas! molasses. The white crowns are especially fond of molasses. It sticks all over their faces, they are so greedy, and they have to wash it off. Once I heard all the birds making a great commotion at the garden table. I rose to look, it not being quite daylight, and saw a sight that was appalling if not ludicrous. A juvenile sparrow, who had not met with the dish in his native Alaska, had thought to pre-empt the entire bowl of molasses, and sat right down in the middle of it. He had not considered the consequences. There he lay, wings outspread, beak open with futile and helpless efforts to extricate himself from the black peril, looking the picture of despair.

All the rest were laughing or screaming, I couldn't tell which. They stood or flew about the unfortunate, but never a hand did they lend. I lifted the bird, washed him, gave him advice, kissed him and opened my hand. Next morning he sat down in the same bowl. Again I attended to his needs, and he remembered. Another spring he will fly away to Alaska and sing all night to his sweetheart all about his "courage in hours of danger," and how he had "two narrow escapes from a tragic death," all on account of outwitting the enemy. But he will never whisper to her that his said enemy kissed him twice and let him go.—Elizabeth Grinnell in Sunset Magazine for November.

A Patriotic Souvenir

I received, as a gift of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a copy of The Declaration of Independence, when my patriotic blood was stirred by the near approach of the Fourth of July. To say that I was delighted is putting it mildly. Though at a late day, I thank you from my heart for this souvenir.

I consider the HERALD one of the best religious papers. I read it with edification and spiritual profit. May the Lord bless your labors of love.

Red Letter Bible

First of all, we make mention of our New Edition of the Red Letter Bible, the only Bible of its kind in the world. As many of our readers already know, this exceptional Bible, of which over 100,000 have been printed in less than two years, is the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures, printed in black, with the following notable exceptions. In the OLD Testament, every incident or passage quoted or alluded to by our Lord during his earthly ministry, is printed in Red. All the references to our Lord's words are printed in Red, and Every verse accepted as pointing to our Lord as the Coming Messiah, is distinguished by a Red Star. In the NEW Testament, all the words spoken by our Lord and Saviour are printed in Red. This beautiful Bible also contains a Synopsis of all the Books of the Bible, enabling the reader in fifteen minutes to acquaint himself with the General Contents of the Holy Scriptures. In addition to this, there are many hundreds of Important Changes by the Revision, the Teachers' Helps, colored Maps by Major Condor, and a unique Movable Celluloid Bookmark, showing, in alphabetical arrangement, the page at which every Book of the Bible begins.

The Red Letter Bible is set in very large type, is superbly bound in American Levant, Divinity Circuit, soft and flexible, with overlapping ends, Red under Gold edges, and is sent, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, every week (52 times), for only $3.00.

Pilgrim's Progress

Second in Order, we offer an unequaled presentation edition of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, exquisitely illustrated and superbly printed on 428 large pages, with a Red Line around each page.

Dr. Chas. M. Sheldon, in his eloquent introduction to this superb edition of Pilgrim's Progress, says:

If this edition of Pilgrim's Progress shall go into the homes of America to be read there, it will not be possible to measure the results on the next generation. A revival of its reading would result in a much-needed revival of the vivid conception of the Christian life, and it is with a prayer that such a revival may result from this special publication of the vision of John Bunyan, that I humbly write these few words and bid the volume Godspeed. CHARLES M. SHELDON.

Very handsomely bound in rich Vellum de Luxe, this unusually attractive book makes one of the most Charming Holiday Gifts of the year. The volume measures when open 9 x 15 inches. It weighs three pounds, and is sent, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, every week (52 times), on receipt of only $2.

Morrison's Great Book

Third in Order, we mention one of the most charmingly romantic, inspiring, and instructive books of travel ever published. It is Mr. Harry Steele Morrison's latest work, "How I Worked My Way Around the World." Mr. Morrison, when a mere boy, only sixteen years of age, undertook to circle the globe. Of money he had but little—but, determined to live up to his ambition, he engaged as a pantry-boy on one of the great Transatlantic steamers, crossed the sea, and traveled over 50,000 miles, literally working his way around the world. His dauntless pluck secured for him audiences with Mr. Gladstone, Queen Victoria, King Leopold, Pope Leo XIII., Paul Krueger and other notabilities, and finally landed him, a first-cabin passenger, back in the country of his birth, rich in experience and in financial results.

"How I Worked My Way Around the World" is superbly printed, beautifully illustrated and exceptionally well bound in rich Vellum de Luxe; with emblematic and very ornamental decoration.

It contains 408 large pages, set from new type in the most modern typographical style, and measures when open 9 x 15 inches. Russell Sage has written the introduction to this remarkably interesting volume.

It is sent, all charges prepaid, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the queen of American weeklies, for one year, every week (52 times), at only Two Dollars.

FOR an Intelligent Family, there is no Christmas Present in the World preferable to a full set of The Crown Encyclopedia. Whether intended for your Own Home, your Parents, your married Son or Daughter, your Pastor, or Sunday School Teacher, The Crown Encyclopedia will give Greater Satisfaction to the Giver, as well as to the Fortunate Recipient, than any other Set of Books or Article. If you wish to make a very Rich Present, Send $1.00 Extra for Fine Half-Leather Binding. Money Refunded if you are not Delighted. This great Work, consisting of 5 Volumes, Containing 3,000 Pages, 500 Illustrations and 96 Colored Maps, all Superbly Bound in Cloth, with genuine Gold Stamp, with "The Christian Herald," the Queen of American Weeklies, for One Year, and Our Butterfly Calendar—All For Only $3.00. We PREPAY CHARGES. Canadian Subscribers Send 50 CENTS EXTRA for Customs.

Do You Wish This Butterfly Calendar?

RARELY, if ever, has a calendar been issued that can compare with our Superb Drop-Leaf Butterfly Calendar for 1904 and 1905. The best artists known were engaged to reproduce in all their Natural Brilliancy and Richness of Coloring a series of Tropical and Semi-Tropical Butterflies, and The Forbes Lithograph Company had the original butterflies continually at hand, to enable them, step by step, to compare their work with nature's product.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

They have marvelously succeeded in accurately reproducing all the delicate tracings, and never was more perfect work issued from any lithographic press. Four Lovely Children's Faces lend additional grace and beauty to this Art Production, which covers a space, when unfolded, of 10½ by 29 inches, or over 300 Square Inches, and supplies the calendar for Two Whole Years. This Artistic Gem will beautify many a home during the coming two years.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Fifteen Printings were required to bring the work to the high standard which The Christian Herald always demands, and on which its enviable reputation for superior work has been established. This Calendar goes Free, postage prepaid, with every subscription.

A GROUP OF MACEDONIAN REFUGEES AT SAMOKOV

MACEDONIA AND ITS PEOPLE

By the REV. D. N. FURNAJIEFF, a Native of Macedonia

MACEDONIA is to-day so much before the public eye, that I gladly accept the invitation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to write some facts on the subject for the benefit of its readers. Not a little has been said and written, either from lack of proper information or from a desire to throw the whole question overboard, and escape every annoyance from it.

Macedonia has suffered this year much more than the public knows, and while it is not the purpose of the present article to point out the guilty parties, I can safely state that all the people, of whatever nationality, living in that unfortunate country, are tired of the present suspense and distressing condition, and desire that the Powers should bring about some changes which will be satisfactory, for the majority at least. Even Turks have said to us, "Well, if Allah has decreed a change, and the change is for the best, the sooner this uncertainty and anxiety end the better."

We must keep in mind the fact that Macedonia has been for many years "the bone of contention," both for the small and large countries around, but the question of a Macedonian autonomy—equality of rights to all alike—under a Christian Governor-general, who will be responsible directly before the European Powers, is the most satisfactory solution of the problem for all the subjects of the Sultan concerned. Whether his Majesty the Sultan can, consistently with the faith he defends, peacefully consent to put Mohammedans and non-Mohammedans on equal footing or not is another question; but it is a fact that we can never hope for the pacification of the country before such rights are guaranteed to the natives; and, to our mind, this is the best thing for the peace, the purse and the reign of the Sultan himself.

As to the outward appearance of the native Macedonians I need not speak, for the present pictures will serve both to illustrate that and also to correct some past misimpressions. Ethnically, Macedonia cannot be claimed exclusively by any one of her neighboring nations. Exact statistics in Turkey are difficult to obtain, for the object of the government statistics is mainly to give the Turks, and no Turks, it being immaterial to the Sultan whether his rayas (subjects) are Servian, Bulgarian, Greek or any other. However, even this question is not so hopeless. By far the largest majority of the population is Bulgarian, who number more than 1,250,000, i.e., nearly one half of the entire population. This is according to English and German writers on the subject. The Greeks often astonish us with statistics that put their number first, but impartial and disinterested judges declare that the present descendants of the ancient philosophers err in the matter. It is not fair to count men and women Greeks because they adhere to the Greek Church, any more than it would be fair to call the Russians Greeks, because their national church is the Greek Church, or to call all the American Catholics Italians, because they adhere to the church of Rome. Nationality and religious persuasion are not mutually inclusive; and therefore it becomes necessary to make a distinction.

A BULGARIAN DOCTOR AND WIFE

MACEDONIAN INSURGENT

A MACEDONIAN TEACHER

It is true also that the insurrection in Macedonia this year is not a local affair, which could easily have been suppressed; but the whole country, from one end to the other, has risen up, demanding rights, while it is well known that the Greeks have opposed most secret Macedonian aspirations, and even the government of Greece astounded the world and put to shame her liberators from the Turkish rule, by its open success efforts to help Turkey to put down the revolution which effort, however, the Sultan declined. Let us, therefore, remember that the largest element ethnically is Bulgarian, and that is why the revolution is called Bulgarian.

Before giving some of the traits of character of the Macedonian Bulgarians, let me make it clear that these Bulgarians are by blood and by religious belief the same with the Bulgarians of Bulgaria, with this difference only, that the latter are under an independent constitutional government of their own.

The American Pulpit

THE NEW LIKENESS

Sermon Preached by DR. O. P. GIFFORD

in Delaware Avenue Baptist Church, Buffalo, N. Y.

TEXT—COL. 3: 9-11—"YE HAVE PUT OFF THE OLD MAN WITH HIS DEEDS, AND HAVE PUT ON THE NEW MAN, WHICH IS RENEWED IN KNOWLEDGE AFTER THE IMAGE OF HIM THAT CREATED HIM"

THE written page cannot change its message. What is written, is written. If this were not true, there could be no recorded history, no literature, no published philosophy. If the manuscript could change its message as men change their minds, there might be no past recorded for us to study. The great manuscripts in the British Museum, and in the libraries of Paris and St. Petersburg, carry the message of the Gospel as written on them centuries ago. There can be no change on the written page except a man make it.

The vegetable world is God's manuscript. On it he has written his thoughts. The world of nature has no power to change itself, otherwise we could have no agriculture. If the sown seeds could change their minds, we could never count upon the harvest. A tree set up in its place gives a type of fruit, and brings forth a verdure in keeping with its kind; and as the years press upon it the sunshine, and the rain, and the soil, the answer is always the same—the leaves, the flowers, the fruit, do not change. A man may travel the wide world over, he may change his mind a thousand times, but he knows, when he reaches home, the same tree will be bearing the same kind of apples he learned to love when a boy.

There is no power in animal nature to change itself. Each brings forth after its kind. If change is wrought, it is wrought by the will of the Creator. But when we struggle up to the level of man, we find a being who can change himself—a being endowed with will and power of choice—one who can put off the old man with his deeds. Habit is used in two senses. It means the clothes we wear and the manner of doing the things we do. A woman wears a riding habit because she has the habit of riding, and when she changes the habit of riding, she changes the riding habit. She can change both. A man adapts his habits to the habits of his profession or business. He can change both. We can put off the old and put on the new from the heart out.

Incomplete Changes

One of the most interesting studies in nature is given to us by Huxley in the study of the cray-fish, an English fresh water lobster. It is seven or eight inches long, and dwells alongside English streams. Its shell can never be enlarged, but its body continues to grow. When the live body has outgrown the shell, the little cray-fish withdraws from its fellows, and begins to rub its limbs against each other and against the shell. Then it throws itself on its back, draws in the tail, forces up the breast, draws in the head, and with a mighty struggle, bursts out of its shell. For two or three days it is very timid, for it has no protection. Then it expands to the utmost of its body, and forms a new shell; but it is just like the old one. It has changed the outer habit without changing the inner habit. It is another expression of the same life. So the trees weave leaves and flowers, then toss them aside, and the next year weave new ones; but the new are just like the old. So is it with some men I have seen. They go through a tremendous struggle to change their personal habits, and then reform them on the old lines. They take the pledge the first of January, and go without drinking a month; then drink enough for the month; and the shell hardens.

Paul is writing to men who have changed not only the external but also the internal habit of life—have put off the old man and put on the new man—have a new heart, a new mode of life, new methods of thought, new purposes. Man is at bottom a will. He has mental faculties, affections, imagination: he is a will. He can put his mental faculties where he pleases, can change his imaginations, can shift his centre—can reorganize his life by successive acts of the will. Great icebergs at times seem to move against the tide and current, because, fathoms deep, there are great currents that are moving in the opposite direction, and the bulk of the iceberg is in the underlying current. The underlying current of a man's soul is the will. He can carry his affections, thoughts, and purposes dead against the social currents and the political movements of the age in which he lives.

Paul is writing to men who have been doing this. They have put off the old man and have put on the new. A man can change his national life. Born and bred in Germany until middle life, for good and sufficient reasons he becomes an American. By an act of the will he compares the two civilizations, the two forms of government, the two sets of opportunities. He puts his property on the market, and embarks by successive acts of the will. He takes out citizenship papers under the American Republic. He wears American-made clothes, eats American-cooked food, changes his literature and reads American history, changes his loyalty and swears loyalty to the American flag. You will find him, if need be, in the forefront of the American army even in opposition to the German Empire. He has changed himself—laid off the old Germany and put on the new America.

A man can change his professional life. Trained for the practice of medicine for years, the conviction comes to him that he ought to become a preacher. Such a thing happened in the case of Dr. Boughton. He left a practice which brought him $4,000 a year, and went to preaching on a salary which brought him a bare living. He sold his office and instruments. He sold his library and bought books on theology, and began to preach. By successive acts of the will he reorganized his whole mental life. Instead of being an authority on the cure of the body, he became an authority on the cure of souls.

A man can change his religious life. Born and bred a Jew, looking for salvation to the law, he can, by an act of the will, pass out of Judaism into Christianity, looking to Jesus Christ for salvation through faith. Forgetting the things that are behind, he can know but one thing in the world—Jesus Christ and Him crucified. There is nothing that requires such a stupendous act of the will as to change the deep, underlying currents of a man's religious life. Abraham, born in Ur of the Chaldees, worshiped strange Gods. A ray of light from the white throne fell upon his soul, and he became a pilgrim in a strange land. He went out not knowing where he went, and sought a city whose builder and maker was God. He became the pioneer of millions who have traveled from earth to heaven. Moses, bred in a palace, chose to suffer affliction with the people of God, enduring as seeing him who is invisible. He gave forty years to the desert and forty years to the wilderness, and was buried in an unmarked grave.

Next to the will of God, the will of man is the one omnipotent power in the universe. When Christ would sum up God, he said, "Thy will be done." And man is made in the image and likeness of God. A man can turn the old tenants out of his mental life, and can rehang new pictures on the walls of imagery. He can change the tidal movements of his affections by an act of the will; else our social and political organizations are at fault, for we hold men responsible for what they do. If man cannot do as he will, he is not responsible for what he does.

Paul is writing to men who have put off the old and have put on the new, and when they have put off the old and have put on the new, straightway they begin to be moulded into conformity with the new. He shall be moulded or recreated into the likeness of the image of the Son of God. He changes his mind. We enter into the knowledge of a new Being, whom we have chosen deliberately to be our ideal. He makes over his knowledge to us. I look into the faces of boys who are in our high schools. All the knowledge of the teachers becomes yours. All that is bound up in the printed book is filtered into your mind. In a year or two more you will have graduated from the high school and entered on the university life. You will come into contact then with new men, new methods, new books. The old high school has given you all it can. You have outgrown its text-books and professors. You have changed into another world. These new professors will give you their knowledge of astronomy and biology, and culture and history. They will transfer their minds, until their knowledge becomes a part of your mental furniture. The great truths and principles of the books pass into your inner life, until you find you are moulded into the likeness of the teachers. You have taken the impress of the books, and bear the inspiration of the university, and wherever you go, you bear with you the result of that college life.

The Transformed Life

A man puts on the new man, Jesus Christ, and he is moulded into the image and likeness of that new man. And the knowledge that Christ has becomes my knowledge, and the inspiration of Christ becomes my inspiration, and the will of Christ becomes my will, until life is transfigured and transformed into the image and likeness of the Great Teacher—the Son of God. The old man gave me knowledge of sin, iniquity, suffering, death. The new man gives me knowledge of God, duty, eternal life, destiny beyond the stars.

You go to Washington, and while the city sleeps, seek the Naval Observatory. There you find a man who has studied the stars—observed the worlds above. You enter the Naval Observatory, and close the door. You put yourself, as it were, into his hands, and say, "I want to know what you have mastered and see what you have seen." He tells you that it will take you years. You answer, "I don't care if it takes a life-time. Here I am. Give me what you know." You shut the world away. The busy world that struggles by daylight is nothing to you. The starry world that swims in the night is all to you. You have put off the old—the day of light, and have put on the new—the night of darkness. In the night hour you know much of many worlds. He adjusts the telescope. You watch him. The large lens points to a distant world. You are many feet below the little end. You cannot climb. He smiles and touches a spring, and slowly the floor rises with you on it, and lifts you until you are on a level with the lower end of the telescope. Then the great new world bursts upon your vision. You put on the new world.

So a soul puts off its studies in the flesh, and comes to Jesus Christ with his knowledge of God, truth and life, and says, "I want to be a Christian man—to know what you know and live what you live and be what you are. He looks into your face and says, "It will take you years, nay, eternity." But you say, "I care not for that. I want this, thy knowledge, thy power, thy purity." He begins with you. The beginning of every new form of life is hard. The text of the new book swims before you. The problems are a puzzle beneath your eyes. The new form of discipline strains the muscles in a new way. The new way of life in the new community hurts. So, when a man begins religious life, it means so much and yet so little. But you give yourself into the keeping of the new man, and he trains the telescope on the very face of God; and through His Word comes the smile of the Infinite. Through the wire he has stretched comes the voice of the Infinite. Slowly he lifts the whole level of your life, until your life becomes one with his truth and one with God. You have put off the old man. You have put on the new man with his deeds.

The Act of Surrender

It is hard at first. It is done by an act of surrender, by an act of acceptance, by repeated acts of acceptance as new truth comes. By and by you find it is easier to think as Christ thinks, than to think as the world thinks: easier to pray to God than to talk to men; easier to read the Bible than the morning paper; better to go to prayer meeting than the theatre. The whole sweep of a man's life has changed, when he comes to think Christ's thoughts—to share God's life by the simple act of the will—by the taking of one's soul in the hands of one's will, as it were, and putting it into the keeping of Jesus Christ. You have put off the old, you have put on the new. You are being conformed to the image of the new man—coming up to the level of his knowledge. You are mastering his philosophy, science and art of life.

What then? Where there is neither Jew nor Greek, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free. There was no greater gulf between nations in the time of Christ and Paul than that between the Jew and the Greek. The Jew sought for signs, the Greek sought for wisdom. The Jew could not be convinced of the truth until the truth manifested itself in a visible way through miracles. The Greek could not be convinced unless the truth was self-con-

OUR NEW CANAL TREATY WITH PANAMA

EVENTS have followed each other in rapid succession in regard to our relations with the new Republic of Panama. Not only has the Republic been recognized by this Government, but a new convention or treaty, providing for the construction of the canal by the United States, has been signed by Secretary Hay and Philippe Bunau Varilla, the Minister of the new Republic. This important act took place in Secretary Hay's study in Washington on November 18. The treaty, it is authoritatively explained, contains these provisions:

Panama cedes to the United States whatever land or lands throughout the Republic of Panama this Government shall find desirable in connection with the building or the operation and maintenance of the canal. In addition, it gives to the United States absolute sovereignty over the canal strip, which comprises between eight and ten miles on each side of the canal. Within this zone the power of the United States is absolute.

ENVOYS FROM THE NEW REPUBLIC

1. Dr. Manuel E. Amador 2. Carlos Arosemena 3. Frederico Boyd 4. Pablo Arosemena

The new treaty contains many of the provisions of the failed Hay-Herran treaty, but it follows not only the spirit, but the letter of the Spooner act. Thus, instead of the lease for a fixed period of the canal strip, this new treaty provides for a perpetual grant of the right of way to the United States, and instead of a complicated provision for courts of mixed composition—half American and half Colombian—to administer justice over the canal strip, the new treaty permits this Government to exercise complete jurisdiction. Permission also is given to the United States to fortify the line and the terminals, and police it with troops. The cities of Panama and Colon retain their municipal autonomy under the Republic of Panama, as long as they maintain public order and sanitary conditions to the satisfaction of the United States. Failure to do this gives the United States, according to the treaty, the right to force strict compliance with the wishes of this Government in this direction.

The money consideration is the same in the new treaty as in the Hay-Herran convention, with the exception that the $10,000,000 go to Panama instead of to Colombia. The treaty provides that the canal is to be neutral, and open to all nations on even terms.

It is expected that the new Republic will ratify the treaty with due promptness.

There are two embassies now visiting this country in connection with Panama affairs. One is from the Panama Republic, and consists of two Commissioners: Dr. Manuel E. Amador and Frederico Boyd, with Carlos Arosemena, Secretary. This party has arrived in Washington as a special commission empowered to treat with our Government concerning affairs relative to the new Republic not already definitely adjusted. The other embassy is from Colombia, and includes Dr. Antonio R. Blanco, Domenico Jimenez and Julio C. Zuniga. They were appointed by President Marroquin to visit the United States and request this Government in general to accept propositions not favorable, and they were also authorized to open negotiations for a new canal treaty between Colombia and the United States. Their mission will probably be futile, the new treaty with Panama having already been acted upon by our Government.

Dispatches from Bogota, the Colombian Capital, indicate that an alarming condition of affairs prevails there. U. S. Minister Beaupre, who, in all probability, have to leave as he is thought to be in actual peril, owing to the open hostility of the Colombians towards Americans. The Marroquin government professed to understand the position of this country in the Panama matter and Secretary Hay cabled to Minister Beaupre directions to inform the Colombian Government in the kindliest way, that, in the interest of humanity and for the good of the world at large, the United States had recognized the Panama Republic and would therefore to permit Colombian troops to land on the Isthmus, as their presence there could only cause bloodshed and disorder, which this Government was bound by treaty obligation to prevent." Mr Beaupre was instructed also to offer the good offices of the United States to bring about an adjustment on an amicable basis of the relations between the governments of Colombia and Panama. It is highly probable that the Colombian government may break off relations with the United States.

THE PROPOSED ROUTE OF THE CANAL

Apparently it is making preparation for sending an armed force by land to the Isthmus, to subdue the revolted states. Colombia has appealed to the South American Republics in addition to making a protest to the American Government against our recent course with regard to Panama. Meanwhile there are indications of serious internal disturbances in that country, which may materially affect its attitude. The states of Cauca and Antioquia, have indicated a desire to join Panama in seceding from Colombia. Should Marroquin's government find itself facing a new revolt in that quarter, it is not unlikely that Brazil or Venezuela, or both, might invade Colombia, and practically its complete dismemberment. Cauca and Antioquia are two of the largest revenue producing states of the Republic, and they have long standing grievances against the politicians of Bogota, who have disregarded their best interests. Besides, Cauca would benefit greatly by the construction of the isthmian canal.

According to the latest news from Colon, Gen. Reyes and the Colombian commissioners, having failed to induce Panama to return to its allegiance, will report to the government at Bogota in favor of war measures for the subjugation of the Isthmus. Gen. Reyes says one hundred thousand Colombians would invade Panama, if necessary.

THE NEW LIKENESS

sistent, and the circle of truth was complete, and the ends joined. The Jew was convinced through his sense of the truth of the statement; the Greek by the self-consistency of the statement in itself. Can you imagine two moods of mind further apart than these? The one would know Jesus Christ came from God because of the signs; the other, because of the consistency of the truth. One looked for the proof from without; the other, from within. They could not see eye to eye. And yet, when the Jew became a Christian, and the Greek became a Christian, there was no distinction, neither Jew nor Greek, they were both fused in the common fire.

New England was settled by a class of people from England called Puritans; New York, by people from Holland; Virginia, by a class of people from England called Cavaliers. They could not see eye to eye. The years went by, and the colonies grew. By and by Great Britain reached across to throttle the new life of the colonies. Then the Puritan and the Dutchman and the Cavalier were united. There was no Yankee, no Dutchman, no Cavalier: all were American citizens. There was no East, no West, no Massachusetts, no Illinois. If a great federal principle—passion for one's country—can break down these distinctions, joining our common lives in Christ Jesus breaks down the middle wall of partition, and makes a new man of the twain.

The North and the South had been glaring at each other for years. There came the Spanish struggle: and men from New England and the West and the South—and—Roosevelt from New York, Joe Wheeler from Virginia—struggled side by side up San Juan hill. The fierce fires of the war had melted the men together. If the fierce fires of war can melt men together, shall not the flaming fire of the new life break down the middle wall of partition between Jew and Greek?

Neither circumcision nor uncircumcision. Circumcision was the badge of religion. The Jew boasted in it. But when the uncircumcised and the circumcised knelt together by the Cross, circumcision was nothing and uncircumcision was nothing, but a new man in Christ Jesus. Two nothings always equal each other. If circumcision and uncircumcision are both nothing, you have the sign of equality between the two. The two have lost their meaning in the new and larger life.

Neither Barbarian nor Scythian, neither bond nor free. Here is the master. Here is the slave. The master, Philemon, accepts Christ. The slave Onesimus, accepts Christ; and they meet as brothers—neither bond nor free.

When a man in a balloon begins to rise above the busy earth, he finds the little fences made by men fade away. Drifting into the upper silence, he loses the strife of the times. There are no lines, no sounds, when a man looks down upon the footstool of God. When a man is lifted high enough in Jesus Christ, the Jew is his brother, the Greek is his brother, the Scythian, the Barbarian, the circumcised, the uncircumcised, the bond and the free, all are his brothers.

Come to the shore. The tide has gone out, and the sand is hollowed into a thousand little pools, long and short, large and small. And each little pool boasts that it is the sea, saying, "Come to me by day; I reflect the sun. Come to me by night, and I will show you the stars." What is the ripple of the waves, as the passing wind tosses the sound to me? "Come to me; I am the sea." And alongside, beyond the sand ledge, is another pool, making its boast—a wild chorus of a thousand voices, each claiming to be the sea. The tide is coming in: and now there will be no sand differences, no pools. The sea is all and in all. Whenever we put on the new man, in whom there is neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian nor Scythian, bond nor free, but Jesus Christ is all and in all, how the little sand bars flatten, how the little pools widen into lakes, enlarging until the boom of the great sea drowns the thousand voices of the petty chorus that cries each for itself.

Come with me along the side of the continent. Here is the St. Lawrence River. It tells the story of its birth in the Northwest and of the miracle it has wrought in building great cities and bearing the commerce of the continent. The Connecticut River will tell of its birthplace among the New England hills, and of giving birth to great city after great city. The lordly Hudson tells the story of the Empire State. The mighty Mississippi tells the story of the commerce of a great continent. As I stand by the mouth of each and hear its story, I believe with each in turn that it is the mightiest watercourse of the world. Come with me in a yacht. We will go a mile out from the shore. Where is the St. Lawrence? Where is the Connecticut? Where is the great Hudson? Where is the mighty Mississippi? They have merged their life in the larger ocean—taken to themselves the saving power of the salt water—sharing with its mighty tidal movements—and they smile when we try to recall the glamor of the St. Lawrence, the claim of the Connecticut, the boast of the Hudson, the bravo of the Mississippi. The sea is all and in all. They have put on the new life—have lost their petty distinctions and happier to live except in the wind from the palms of God. Ye have put on the new man, in whom there is neither Jew nor Greek, Englishman nor American, African nor Chinaman, bond nor free, but the Son of Man. Filled with the righteousness of God, obedient to the movements of the Divine Will, enthroned on the circle of the earth, you have been moved to put him on and to cast off those miserable barriers and distinctions—manmade, but which have no meaning with God.

Go to a globe, and you will find lines of latitude and longitude; but they are in the mind of man. You do not know when you cross them on land or sea. They are simply the measure of man's limitations. They have no reality. When you rise near enough to God you get above the latitude and longitude that measure man's limitations.

Come along the streets of the city by night. Here is an electric lamp. Here is a gas lamp. Here is a home is an oil lamp, each emitting its light in the city. Go through the city at night and you will and in all. The earth has put on the new and true have gone out by themselves. So it is with those in any real and genuine way; they put on the new the new man. The varieties of [illegible] riers of ritual and social distinctions have Jesus Christ is all and in all.

Have you put on the new man? How [illegible] point of view? Do you share [illegible] manity?

MRS. SPURGEON'S BEAUTIFUL LIFE

She was the Special Friend and Benefactress of Poor Pastors, and a Good Angel to Many Others

PASSING away, twelve years after the death of her husband, the "home-going" of Mrs. Charles H. Spurgeon, widow of the famous London preacher, was an event which awakened, in the hearts of those who knew her and her long life of good deeds, a feeling of genuine sorrow. Testimony abounds to show that the life of that home in which her influence was paramount, was a most beautiful one.

Mrs. Susannah Spurgeon was the daughter of Mr. Robert Thompson, of London, and became acquainted with her future husband through being invited to attend New Park Street Chapel on the evening when he, described as "the young man from Waterbeach," preached his first sermon there. His pulpit gifts did not then make a deep impression on her, but she was much attracted by his earnestness. When he accepted the pastorate, she at once cast in her lot with the cause of God there, and from the outset of her connection was an enthusiastic worker.

Occasionally Miss Thompson and Mr. Spurgeon met at the house of friends, but it was some time before their acquaintance warmed into friendship and their friendship into love. Of this period, Mrs. Spurgeon wrote:

No bright dream of the future flashed distinctly before my eyes till the day of the opening of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, on June 10, 1854. A large party of our friends, including Mr. Spurgeon, were present at the inauguration, and we occupied some raised seats at the end of the Palace. As we sat there talking, laughing and amusing ourselves as best we could, while waiting for the procession to pass by, Mr. Spurgeon handed me a book, into which he had been occasionally dipping, and, pointing to some particular lines, said, "What do you think of the poet's suggestion in those verses?" The volume was Martin Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy, then recently published. The pointing finger guided my eyes to the chapter on "Marriage," of which the opening sentences ran thus:

Seek a good wife of thy God, for she is the best gift of his providence;
If thou art to have a wife of thy youth, she is now living on the earth;
Therefore think of her, and pray for her weal.

"Do you pray for him who is to be your husband?" said a soft, low voice in my ear, so soft that no one else heard.

Later in the afternoon Mr. Spurgeon invited her to walk round the Palace with him, and the Palace, after their engagement, which shortly followed, was their favorite trysting-place.

The marriage ceremony was performed in 1856, and the joint life then begun was ideally happy. In after days (says her biographer in the London Christian) she told how in the beginning of their wedded life Mr. Spurgeon was frequently obliged to be absent from home fulfilling preaching engagements, and she felt these separations as a heavy burden on her heart, though anxious never to be a hindrance to him in his work for God. One day her husband turned to her and said, "Wife, do you think that when any of the children of Israel brought a lamb to the Lord's altar, as an offering to him, they stood and wept over it?" "Why, no," she replied, "certainly not; the Lord would not be pleased with a sacrifice grudgingly given." "Well," said he, "you are giving me to God, by letting me go to preach the Gospel to poor sinners; and do you think he likes to see you cry over your sacrifice?" And so she learned her lesson.

One evening, when she was living at Brighton for her health, Mr. Spurgeon arrived from London with a large package, which, when uncovered, proved to be a cage containing a lovely piping bullfinch. In her weakness she had been longing to possess such a bird, but without either of them making the wish known. Mr. Spurgeon had gone to visit a friend whose husband was seriously ill, and who asked him to take it to cheer Mrs. Spurgeon in her loneliness. His remark to her that evening was, "I think you are one of your Heavenly Father's spoiled children, and he gives you whatever you ask for."

Ministers, missionaries, and other Christian workers in every part of the world think and speak with gratitude of the Book Fund, with which Mrs. Spurgeon's name has been identified. This effort had a very simple beginning. She tells herself, how that in the summer of 1875, when reading the proofs of the first volume of her husband's Lectures to My Students, her answer to the question, "How do you like it?" was, "I wish I could place it in the hands of every minister in England." "Then," was the ready response, "why not do so? how much will you give?" The arrow went home, and the Book Fund was unconsciously started with a sum she had laid aside, and which proved just sufficient to pa for one hundred copies. The organization took defini shape in a few weeks, and the making known of th need led to a response so hearty that in the course the following winter, grants were made of The Treasu of David, and the Sermons. In twelve months th amount received was £500, which paid for 3,058 volume The only shadow on the movement was the revelatio of the great need of so many country pastors, who, o almost incredibly small incomes, and surrounded difficulties of many kinds, were faithfully holding fort the Word of Life to the poor.

The benefits of the Fund were not limited to Baptis or Nonconformists, and at the end of ten years it w found that over 12,000 ministers of all denominatio had been supplied with books. While at first, only M Spurgeon's own books were aimed at, this limitatio was soon swept aside. In 1886, Mr. Spurgeon declare that the work was outgrowing his wife's physic powers, and that she could not possibly continue lon to labor all day long, as she had been doing, at corr spondence and bookkeeping. The gratitude of the r cipients was more than sufficient reward for the toil.

On January 31, 1892, came the great sorrow of Mr Spurgeon's life, in the death of her husband. Descril ing their joint pilgrimage she wrote—

At last they came to a place on the road where two way met; and here, amidst the terrors of a storm such as they ha never before encountered, they parted company—the one b ing caught up to the invisible glory—the other, battered an bruised by the awful tempest, henceforth toiling along th road—alone.

But the brave spirit took up the additional burde and carried it. Round the main Fund there grew up on for the translation of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons into fo eign tongues and other purposes, called for "Genera Use in the Name of the Lord." Another, which is pe haps too little known, is the "Pastors' Aid Fund," th woes and wants of poor ministers pressing heavily o this sympathetic heart

Quietly and steadily she went forward in her ministr of love. In many a ministerial home life was brighte because of her help; and the service done for the Lor was full of testimony to His grace, because a "cup c water" had been supplied in time of need, and woul not be forgotten.

Mrs. Spurgeon has done more than circulate th works of others. Her own three little books—A Cari lon of Bells, A Cluster of Camphire, and A Basket o Summer Fruit—have been a means of blessing to many

The portrait of Mrs. Spurgeon, which appears on thi page, is from a comparatively recent photograph. Th portrait in a late issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was not a likeness of Mrs. Spurgeon, but of a Mis Bouser, who was long connected with the Tabernacl work. Furthermore, we are assured that the statemen that Mrs. Spurgeon's death "was precipitated by expo sure in an effort to promote one of the Tabernacle u dertakings"—which originally appeared in one of th London weeklies—is unfounded. She had been unabl to leave her residence or take any active part, perso ally, in church work of the character indicated, fo several years past.

Temperance in France

THE notable manifesto on the liquor question, to which reference was made in this journal recently as having been issued in England, has been followed by a similar movement in France. A prominent European journal says: "The French legislature is arousing itself to action with regard to the ravages of alcoholism in the country. The first step taken is in an 'interpellation' relating to the liquor traffic. At the same time the National Congress against alcoholism meets in Paris, and its sessions are being held during this week. The leading men of France are behind this Congress, and its decisions will be fateful for the liquor business. Scientists have proved that the alarming decrease in population, and the equally alarming increase in lunacy, are due to this same cause. In certain parts of Normandy the consumption of spirits averages nearly a quart a day to every male adult, while among women especially, spirit drinking has assumed frightful proportions."

An Important Correction

The Red Letter Bible is set in very large type, is superbly bound in American Levant, Divinity Circuit, soft and flexible, with overlapping ends, Red under Gold edges, and is sent, all charges prepaid, together with "The Christian Herald" for one year, for only $3.00.

In a recent issue, by a typographical error, it was stated that the Red Letter Bible and "The Christian Herald" for one year would be sent to subscribers for $2. It should have read $3.

What Do You Think of This?

THE RED MEN COMING INTO THE LIGHT

THE INDIANS OF THE CATTARAUGUS RESERVATION DESCRIBED BY ONE WHO KNOWS THEM

THIS Cattaraugus Indian Reservation, located thirty-five miles south of Buffalo, N. Y., has a territory twelve miles in length, by four in breadth. Its dwellings are mostly small but cosy cabins, each surrounded by a patch of cultivated ground. Tepees are no longer used as abiding places. The Indians of the reservation number 1,600 souls, in two communities, Christian and Pagan.

At "Pagantown," until a very recent date, the sacrifice of a dog annually, for the propitiation of the Great Spirit, with other rites, was the great event of the year. At such times, the members of the community were accustomed to assemble from every nook and corner of the reservation with great demonstration and solemnity. Even now, these people cling to some of their old superstitions, and offer sacrifices in a modified form.

A party of Indians was bivouacking in a hill-side cave. Lighting their pipes, they were appalled at the sudden bursting forth of a flame of fire. They had ignited a natural gas flow, and they took this phenomenon to be a flash of anger from the Great Spirit, as the penalty of some former misdeeds. Instantly they turned to the "Medicine Man," and implored him to intercede in their behalf. But such superstitious fears soon disappeared before the light of Christianity, and the people grew in knowledge. The Christian section is now occupied by religious bodies of different denominations, and these are fairly prosperous. The people are honest, peaceable, and reverent, and attending well to their religious duties.

Fillmore Jackson, a full-blooded Indian, is one of the most noted characters among the evangelized. Though Christianized, he retains his original stolidity and secretiveness. A question receives no reply until it is pondered for several minutes, when the answer will be given with great deliberation and caution. This is characteristic of almost every one of the tribe. Many of the Indian youths are students of the school at Carlisle, Pa. They learn quickly, and apply their education readily.

In the centre of the Cattaraugus Reservation is a mound, where may be found stone arrow-heads, hatchets, pipes and pots, and many implements of former savage warfare. This mound, which was probably connected with the sacrificial rites of the past, is an object of fascinating interest to the visitor.

The Tuscarora Reservation is located eight miles from Niagara Falls, to which its members make frequent pilgrimages. The Tuscaroras have attained a higher degree of civilization and religious comprehension than their Cattaraugus brethren. They are industrious, and provident, and cultivate their lands with skill, many acquiring a comfortable competency. The women are proficient workers, and carry to the Falls for sale a profusion of beautiful trinkets and useful articles. The reservation contains a number of churches, one of which has 230 communicants, all in active fellowship. Its pastor, Rev. Frank M. Pleasant, has been in charge for twenty-seven years. He is a man of education and imposing physique, a good theologian and an earnest speaker. There is connected with this church a flourishing Sunday School, of which a bright young Indian, W. H. Jack, is the superintendent. A most attractive feature of this church is its choir of four stately Indian men, with deep, resonant voices.

The writer has had much association with the Dacotahs, also, and has sat in their tepees and conversed by the aid of their sign language and a few acquired phrases. Stricken with illness at one time, some of their number called upon the "Medicine Man," as they style a preacher. Meeting him, they stood with a woe-begone expression of face, then turning without a word, they took their departure. A few days later, meeting them, they cried out, "Ugh! How? How 'Medicine Man?' Me glad." The sick had recovered.

Some of these Dacotahs were in the councils of Sitting Bull, the great chief, some being for war, others for peace. A few, it is said, were present when Custer fell at the battle of Little Big Horn, in 1876. American Horse, Rocky Bear, Eagle Elk and others were among these. When Sitting Bull died in 1890, it was said by some, "Well, the troubler is gone at last." "But," comes the response, "What made him a troubler? The reply is, "Wrongs, injustice, outrage." They remember the story of the Indian, and Joe and the log. The Indian gave Joe a shove, and said, "Move along, Joe." This continued till Joe was moved off the log. "What did you do that for?" angrily asked Joe. "Joe, he like Indian," they explain, "white man push Indian into Pacific sea."

The religious training of these Indians on these reservations named, is due to the Episcopal church, which sent as its missionary rector, the Rev. Mr Brown. His influence has been greatly blessed, and numbers have been brought from the darkness of superstition into the light of the Gospel. Missionary Brown was once present at a meeting held in the church of which the writer was pastor, in company with about one hundred of his proteges, who had been brought east for a conference with the "Great Father" at Washington. These Indians, being located for a season near the church of the writer, continued to worship there. They were always regarded and reverential giving close attention to the sermon. They were an "example" to many "more enlightened" ones, as they complacently regard themselves. On one Sunday the rite of baptism was administered. A astonishment was depicted upon every Indian countenance. Later, one of them said demurely, but reverently, "Big heap wash!" They travel wearisome distances to attend religious meetings, and they are deeply concerned for the spiritual well-being of their kinsmen, regardless of tribal relations. When awakened to the importance of the subject, they become deeply engrossed with missionary and evangelistic enterprises. Among the most zealous is Deacon "Long Wolf," who is, in his way, an efficient soul-winner among his people, and seems to succeed to impart the light he himself has received. Eagle Elk found it hard to divorce himself entirely from the old ideas.

One night, near the church, we heard a mournful, distressful voice, and found that it was Eagle Elk imploring the "Medicine Man," the Great Spirit to keep him "good," that he might not miss the "happy hunting grounds at last."

A young Pawnee boy is an interesting character. He has also been transformed by the influence of divine truth. Ellie (called the princess) is an attractive Dacotah girl, and now the wife of an Indian interpreter. Though these people have assumed the American garb, they on occasion return to their native costume, especially at "State receptions." The writer is personally acquainted with all whose pictures appear in this sketch.

There is more to be feared for these people from the encroachment upon their domains of the whisky traffic than from any other source. Whether the civilized races may or may not be protected from this cruel scourge, it is not too much to affirm that these wards of the nation ought to be fully protected. The possibilities of the missionaries are increased ten-fold, emanating from this sinister source. But, despite all obstacles, it is a cause of rejoicing that "the power of God unto salvation" is able to reach these, and is reaching them as they "believing unto righteousness," and to the "confession of the mouth unto salvation."

FAITH

By Evangelist C. H. Yatman

HAVE faith in God. Have faith in humanity. Have faith in yourself.

A wee bit of this mustard-seed kind will remove mountains.

Dynamite has less power than pure soul belief in God, his personality and his providences.

Let the believer believe—believe with a trust that is born of absolute confidence—and things will come to pass in spite of doubt or devil.

Weak faith is like weeds; distrust and distress are walking companions.

The materialistic age has wrought havoc amongst folk who once believed that the Eleventh of Hebrews—the "Faith Chapter" of the Bible—was really true. Now they hesitate, doubt, question: "It may be history—possibly, but it's not for our day and generation"; but the fact is, it is. I know it, for I have proven it true.

Doubt and get nothing, believe and get something; aye, often all things. One can take his choice.

For myself, I take "the substance of things hoped for." Many a Jericho wall have I seen go down. Red Seas and Jordans I have crossed with as dry feet as any Israelite. I have wandered about in a sheepskin of love amongst wolves, and I have been "sawn asunder" by the crossest saw of hate, envy and false friends; but here I am, happier than a king with the knowledge that "all things work together for good," for Jesus is mine, and he is God! What gets twisted out of shape or turned out of order he will take hold of and bend to the blessing of my life for my good here and hereafter.

My faith is not based on what he does, for often I cannot understand that. I would surely go wrong if I tried to interpret his doings. My little brain and short sight are not equal to his infinite plan and stretch. No, I base my belief not on what he does but on what he is.

God never makes a mistake. So, you see, I can trust him where I can neither understand nor trace him. I don't try, I just trust. If it had not been best—best for my loved ones and best for all—why, it would not have been that way.

I wish they had never locked John Bunyan up in Bedford Jail—a mighty mean thing! If I had run things that would not have happened. But then, neither would Pilgrim's Progress have been written. So I keep my hands off. He runs this old world and all other worlds, and I ask only to fit in his plans, not he in mine. I trust absolutely him.

Among the Workers

—Dr Smiley, Evangelist, and Professor J. McKinney, Gospel singer, have lately been conducting a series of evangelistic services at Grand Haven, Mich. They are now sojourning at Holly, Mich.

—Miss Mattie A. Smiley, who for many years has been an unpaid volunteer missionary on Staten Island, New York, is just recovering from a severe illness that caused a cessation of work. Her address is 111 Bedford avenue, Brooklyn.

—The Spurgeon Orphanage continues maintained by the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, and still carried on by his sons. At the recent anniversary celebration a lady laid down a check for five thousand dollars on the collection plate.

—A Christian Scientist of Toronto, Canada, has been convicted of manslaughter, for having neglected to employ medical help for his child, who died of appendicitis. The Court of Appeals has confirmed the verdict.

—Bishop Potter, of New York, recently dedicated the harbor mission boat Seamen's Church Institute, which the Episcopal Church Mission Aid Society has provided for the spiritual care among the vessels in the port of New York. A description of the Seamen was published recently in The Christian Herald.

"Many Mansions"

THAT our little earth is the only inhabited world amid the myriads of planets around us, is a new and interesting theory which Dr. Wallace, a British astronomer, has lately propounded. He holds that our globe is the centre of things; that man's place in the universe is here, and here alone; and he has flung down the gage to the astronomers of every land, challenging disproof or refutation.

His declaration has naturally created a flutter among the scientists. Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir William Ramsay, Prof. Turner, Prof. Wells, and others of distinction, have each answered in a way which shows that they regard the startling proposition as absurd from a scientific standpoint. They point out that among the countless multitude of planets in the starry heavens, it would not be difficult to conceive of some that are approximately similar to our own, in general conditions and fitness for human habitation, and that it is a wild supposition to conclude that ours is the only one inhabited by intelligent, sentient beings. Spectroscopic examinations have revealed the presence on some of these planets of those elements and compounds that are conditioned to the existence of a moist atmosphere, with oxygen and water, and it is a reasonable scientific presumption that they can support organisms more or less like those we have on this earth. Further, science holds that even with differing elements, it is not improper to conceive of conscious and intelligent beings greatly different from ourselves, yet adapted to their surroundings, some lower, others higher than our world dwellers in the scale of existence.

All such controversies, though inconclusive, are interesting and not unprofitable. We are like children in the dark, even the wisest among us; and as we look upward at the vast, illimitable squadrons of the stars, we are impressed with the majesty of the Omnipotent Creator and stand mute in wonder and in worship. They are all the handiwork of the great Architect who set them upon invisible pillars and swung them out in space, each kept in its place by those Divine laws that govern the whole—laws which telescope and spectroscope may not fathom. Why may not some of those glittering abodes, that shine like palaces in the distant heavens, be the dwelling-place of a higher race of beings? Jesus said, "In my Father's house are many mansions." He knew more about them than all the wisdom of the astronomers.

Religion In New York

DRY as the study of statistics usually is, there are exceptions to the rule, and one of these exceptions is to be found in a perusal of the article on Religion in New York City, which has just been issued by the Federation of Churches. An immense amount of labor must have been given to its production, and the result is a collection of tables, which, as the writers say, show that "there is abundant opportunity for the churches to become fishers of men." The figures are all the more useful because they have been very intelligently classified, and where numbers are recorded which occasion astonishment, an explanation is given that accounts for their extraordinary character. Thus, the fact that a denomination has sustained during the past year, in one section of the city, a heavy loss in the number of its communicants, and has made a large gain during the same period in another section of the city, does not indicate a difference of activity, but is due merely to the fact that a large church is removed from the one section to the other. There is throughout the article a spirit of fairness and impartiality.

Estimating the population of the entire city, including all five boroughs, at 3,818,730 the religious classification based on returns from the churches is, that the Roman Catholics number 1,250,000; the Protestants 1,893,730, and the Jews 675,000. These figures do not, however, represent the actual membership of the churches. There are many persons who call themselves Protestant or Catholic, who seldom enter a church of either denomination, but characterize themselves according to heredity, sympathy or association. Thus the Roman Catholic Church, which includes in its membership, not only actual communicants, but also the entire families of which those communicants are members, claims 984,800 of the 1,250,000 credited to that church, thus showing that 265,200 of the nominal Catholic population are not in church relationship. The proportion of churchless Protestants is still larger. The actual church membership is placed at 331,754. On the assumption, which is found by experience to be generally correct, that the congregation, or persons in connection with a church, or generally attending it, are three and a half times as many as those on the church rolls, we have a total of 1,152,650, which indicates that of the 1,893,730 who are classed as Protestants, 741,080 have no church relationship. The gain during the year in the number of Protestant communicants was 12,818. Reckoning on the same ratio as above, we may assume that about 43,445 persons have been added to the city's Protestant population.

There are forty-three denominations in the Protestant group, and of these, thirty-one report an increase of membership. The largest is the Protestant Episcopal Church, which has added 3,616; next is the Lutheran, with 2,257; next the Methodist Episcopal, with 1,205; and the Congregationalist a close fourth, with 1,202. A notable fact disclosed by the tables, is that the aristocratic section of the city receives more attention from the Protestants than do the poorer sections. In the Fifth avenue district, with a population of 241,422, there are ninety churches, while the East Side, with more than four times the population, has only 114 churches. This fact is probably due to the population of the East Side being largely Jewish and Roman Catholic. We hope it does not indicate that the Protestant churches are forgetting the boast of the early church, that "to the poor the Gospel is preached."

PERSONAL REQUEST FROM DR. KLOPSCH

AGAIN I appeal to the good readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—to whom I never appeal in vain—to help me in a matter which each and every year at this season gives me serious concern.

For the next thirty days mail and express facilities will be taxed to congestion, and unless we can attend to much of our shipping very early in December, we fear that considerable disappointment must result all along the line from delay in deliveries.

This year particularly the problem assumes unusually large proportions, because of our Crown Encyclopedia, of which probably 50,000 sets will be ordered in time for Christmas gifts, not to mention the tens of thousands of volumes of our other premiums. To handle all this material requires an enormous force. Many of the hands are new and inexperienced; all their work must be compared and checked before shipment, and this requires much time and imposes great managerial responsibility.

Then the many thousands of letters which we receive daily must be carefully and intelligently handled, without rush or confusion, if satisfactory service is to result.

Now, what can the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD do to help me in this matter? They can so arrange as to give me four weeks to do quietly, carefully, intelligently and satisfactorily, what otherwise might have to be rushed through amid hubbub and confusion in half the time, resulting in numerous mistakes, disappointments, complaints and dissatisfaction. The way they can aid me best is to send their renewals as soon as possible. They suffer no disadvantage, as the term is always advanced from the present date of expiry, while they greatly help me to give them good and prompt service.

Will you not kindly favor me by co-operating with me to the extent above mentioned, and thus help relieve my mind of much anxiety?

Wm. Klopsch

PROPRIETOR.

The ominous feature of the whole showing for the city, is the extremely slow growth of the churches. The population of the city is growing rapidly, but the numbers added to the membership of the churches are comparatively small. There is clearly need for more earnestness and effort, and prayer, that souls may be won, and the kingdom of Christ be extended.

Bread Upon the Waters

THE cover upon this week's CHRISTIAN HERALD represents a nightly occurrence and yet an unfamiliar one, except in the case of some few large baking establishments. The random poor, vagrant and unfortunate workers, are shown emerging into the light that shines from the back door of a bakery. The baker is supplying them, free of charge, with "left over" loaves of bread. The charity is voluntary and impromptu, and varies with the baker's supply, and sometimes with his mood; but it is a form of charity well founded in his trade.

There is a difference between this form of charity and such externally similar ones as the Sunday Breakfast Associations, Soup Kitchens, Dispensaries of Ice Coal, or Pasteurized Milk. Bakeries being of nightly operation, it has, if nothing more, a picturesqueness that other daily benefactions lack. But this nocturnal feature has an important significance. Because of this fact, the bakery ministers to another class, a more transient (possibly more vagrant) yet unquestionably a more honest and deserving class of the very poor. Under the cover of darkness the poverty-stricken but self-respecting needy ones crawl from sweatshop or basement; the chilled "cabby" descends from his cheerless perch, and the neighboring cripple hobbles from his tenement to the dispensing doorway. The bakery discriminates not in its generosity, and many a sensitive poor soul—who would shrink from the idea of ostentatious assistance as a wound to pride, however much it might be of a solace to the body—comes hither where charity makes no record, and while giving with the right hand of fellowship neglects to inform the left.

Though no one would readily attempt a defense of unorganized charity as opposed to well systematized effort, guided by forethought and maintained with constancy, and though perhaps the active kindliness of the bakeries of our cities would be credited to the score of lax benefaction, yet no one who appreciates generous impulse, and kindly contact, at first hand with the unfortunate, will have anything but sympathy for these unassuming "helpers by the way."

In observing phases of this peculiar charity, which first obtruded itself upon the artist's notice in the town of Wilmington, Delaware, he found that it was being endlessly repeated during the watches of the night with varying degrees of picturesqueness and interest both in other parts of that town and in its neighboring metropolis, Philadelphia. Upon inquiry, he found that the custom of dispensing the surplus product has been of long standing and is quite a tenet of the trade. As regards certain well-known firms whose benefactions in this way have been so long established as almost to come under the category of regular charities, this was not news. The "bread line" has been known in New York for years, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already described its operation on Tenth street, near Broadway. But the artist, having an admiration for such work, seems to have felt enthusiasm to a degree for its imitators on a small scale. It seems to corroborate our faith in general altruism, that sometimes needs buttressing, to find these small houses extending a charity that almost partakes of the nature of hospitality, as if the humble proprietor were offering his royal board, not the crumbs, to his humbler friends. For there is a friendliness about it that refreshes and recalls our ideals of Oriental hospitality, where no journeyman is turned from the Khan and bread and salt are the seal of amity.

An Important Correction

The Red Letter Bible is set in very large type, is superbly bound in American Levant, Divinity Circuit, soft and flexible, with overlapping ends, Red under Gold edges, and is sent, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for only $3.00.

In a recent issue, by a typographical error, it was stated that the Red Letter Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year would be sent to subscribers for $2. It should have read $3.

Thibet to be Invaded

THE seclusion so long enjoyed by Thibet, and so jealously guarded, appears to be nearing an end. A British force is reported to be ow preparing to enter the country from ndia. The invasion is said to have been recipitated by an act of discourtesy on ie part of the Dalai Lama, who is the ıler of Thibet. The British side of the ory is, that an arrangement had been ade for a conference between the Lama nd Colonel Younghusband, with a view negotiating a treaty of commerce, for ie exchange of the products of India for ose of Thibet. The British emissary arted for Lhassa, the capital of Thibet, ccompanied by an escort of Indian troops. When the party had reached Khamba ong, a place thirty miles within Thibetan erritory, it was met by a subordinate fficer of the Lama, who curtly announced hat his master would not receive any missary who was accompanied by a mili- ary escort. He might come on alone and end his escort back, but the escort must ot proceed farther. Colonel Younghus- and fortified his camp, and leaving the escort to defend itself in case of attack, eturned to India to consult with the Viceroy. It is now announced that Colonel Macdonald, a famous British General, has been ordered to organize an expedition, which will advance to Cyanztse, which is ninety miles beyond the place now occu- pied, and is only one hundred and fifty miles from Lhassa. It is reported that the Lama has determined to resist the advance, and that Russia has promised him assistance. Russian generals are said to have been drilling the Thibetan troops, directing the construction of forti- fications and making plans for a military campaign. People familiar with the di- plomacy of Central Asia, aver that it was knowledge of the friendly relations of Russia with Thibet which precipitated the British movement. Thibet lies be- tween British and Russian territory, and Great Britain, fearing that Russia was about to seize Thibet as it has Manchuria, determined to assure itself of the attitude of Thibet, by proposing the commercial treaty which has led to the difficulty. Thibet appears to have been playing a dangerous game. While professing to be absolutely neutral and isolated, she seems to have secretly yielded to Russian influ- ence. The fate which has befallen Man- churia will doubtless be hers, if she does not accept British protection. Many men try to take the same attitude in spiritual matters. They cannot be placed. $5,000 for an Ear

An advertisement appeared in a New York journal a few days ago offering $5,000 to any one who, being in good health and having ears of a particular size, was willing to part with one of them. The advertiser was a physician, who, when questioned about his advertisement, explained that he had a patient who had lost an ear in a mining explosion and desired to replace it. The patient had accumulated a fortune, and was willing to pay $5,000 to any one who would allow his ear to be transferred to his person. The doctor said that the operation could easily be performed and it would not cause the man who parted with his ear to become deaf. He had no doubt, from his knowledge of the poor, that there were many people who would be glad to accept the offer. His prediction proved correct. A large number of applicants besieged his doors and pleaded to be allowed to undergo the operation. Some of them were rejected because their ears were of the wrong size and others on other grounds. Finally, a man was examined who met all requirements. A bargain was made with him and the operation of transferring the ear has been begun. It is surprising that so many people were eager to part with an ear for money. We ought not, however, to be astonished at it, when we see so many cases around us of men selling not one member only, but their very souls, for riches. Few remember the problem Christ submitted to the people of his time:

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul? (Mark 8:36).

A Clue to a Thief

The police of London have just made an arrest of a notorious thief by means of a remarkable clue. The store of a jeweler in an aristocratic quarter of the city was recently broken into by burglars, and goods to the value of $60,000 were carried off. The burglary was done so successfully that no one saw the thieves entering or departing, and the lost property could not be traced. The burglars did not leave, as they sometimes do, any tools or garments which afforded a clue to their identity. One clue, however, there was. One of them, whose hands were dirty, had grasped a candle which had been left behind, and the prints of his fingers were clearly marked on the wax. These were photographed, and the reproduction was sent to the detective headquarters, where for some time past all criminals have been compelled to make an imprint on paper of their finger-tips. The photograph was found to be identical with the imprint of the finger-tips of a man who had served a term for burglary. He was traced, and it was found that he and three companions had recently been in possession of a large sum of money. They were all promptly arrested, and a portion of the jewelry was found upon them, proving that they were the men who had robbed the store. How chagrined the burglar must feel at having left behind so excellent a clue to his identity, when he can apply the art himself.

To Prevent Shipwreck

An ingenious device to prevent a ship foundering has been adopted on the Deutschland of the Hamburg American Line. Many ships which were fitted with watertight bulkheads have sunk, because there was not time for the crew to get to them and close them when an emergency came. An inventor, considering this difficulty, set himself to devise a plan by which it would not be necessary to close the bulkheads by hand. The result has been the application of a double precaution which is now in use on the Deutschland, and is to be introduced on other vessels of the same line. It consists of a main running the whole length of the ship, which is in communication with four steam hydraulic accumulators that give a pressure of seven hundred pounds to the square inch. The main is so placed that the sliding doors of the bulkheads can be forced down whenever the power is applied. This can be done from the bridge by the turn of a lever, as the engineer of a after taking so many precautions to avoid detection. It is so with sinners, who think that their iniquities are done so secretly that they will never be exposed. As the patriarch knew long centuries ago, God has means of fixing the guilt on the wrongdoer.

Thou settest a print on the heels of my feet (Job 13:27).

THE PROPOSED BEAUTIFICATION OF CHAUTAUQUA

THE plans for the future Chautauqua, now for the first time made public, show that the three master-minds by which the scheme of reconstruction has been evolved, have surpassed all expectations. Herbert Kelsey, the Philadelphia architect, has had associated with him in the preparation of the plan for a reconstructed Chautauqua, J. Massy Rhind, the sculptor, and Warren H. Manning, the landscape architect and designer of the entrance to the Yellowstone Park, recently dedicated These three artists have succeeded in making Chautauqua what it is intended to be—a model for a city beautiful.

The pilgrim to the Chautauqua of the future, will land in a gray stone building in the Italian Renaissance style, in the ornamental tower of which there will be a splendid chime of bells, and a perforated disk, from which will shine out at night the seal of the society, in electric lights. From this building the visitor will pass to Miller Park, a magnificent approach to the centre of the grounds. On either side will be groups of statuary, and in front the grand staircase, six flights of stairs, the risers of which will be cut with appropriate quotations, the whole one hundred feet wide.

From this point a view can be had of the entire glories of the place. The pilgrim will see before him a grand plaza, flanked by an arcade and market place, and an amphitheatre capable of seating 7,000 persons in comfort. In the distance will be the "Hall of Christ" and the "Chapel of the Good Shepherd." To the left of "The Round Table," a circular place named for t course familiar to every Chautauquan, will be the n "Hall of Philosophy," an open, pillared building in t Doric style, which from a broad avenue will lead to t water-gate, designed, like the Pier House, in the Itali Renaissance style.

These are some of the most striking features of t reconstructed Chautauqua, but the "Arts and Cra Building" is not the least of the interesting structures be raised. It is complete in itself, an exact reprod tion of a little mediæval village, making a red-gabl quadrangle, that includes a museum for the instructi of students; shops, places for the teaching of benc iron and brass work, pottery, wood-carving, book-bindi and a great variety of other useful old handicraf

THE WESTWARD TIDE OF IMMIGRATION

WHILE the Italian and Jewish immigrants now arriving in this country are, for the most part, settling in New York and the near-by cities, the great agricultural plains and ranches of the West are the goal to which the Russian, Swedes and Germans are journeying. Trains arriving in the southwest are crowded with these nationalities. It is estimated by land agents making a specialty of homeseeker traffic, that 55,000 have settled in the territory surrounding Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Iowa in the past six months. Missouri is also included in the account, but a majority of the foreigners are making for the great ranches and places where land is cheaper than in Missouri.

St. Louis receives, it is estimated, 65,000 to 75,000 immigrants every month. Many of these are en route to the Pacific coast. Some are bound for the southland, but a majority are going into the great wheat belt of the southwest. In Kansas, they are receiving a cordial welcome, inasmuch as the colonies of foreigners already located there have accomplished much toward the conquering of the prairie sod and the upbuilding of the State's resources. In sections of Kansas, there are communities containing as many as fifty thousand Russians, while the Swedish colony at Lidsborg, Kansas, is well known throughout the country for its cultivated members and the wealth of the people as a class.

WANTED—A REFORM IN SACRED SONG

Composers, Publishers and others Give their Views

Irreverence in our Hymnology Condemned

WHEN Pandora, in the fable, opened the box, there was a sudden flutter of wings, and such a host of troubles flew out that she was momentarily dismayed at the result of her act. But at the bottom she found Hope, the best of the winged array. So THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in its endeavor to awaken public interest to the need of a reform in our modern sacred music, has suddenly uncovered a bevy of sharp, but good-natured critics; but the best of them, fortunately, have the right kind of whirr and hum. The preponderance of these opinions is strongly in support of the reform.

Our readers will recall that, in a recent issue, we invited the views of experts concerning the need of reform in our church music, on the ground that there "has been a tendency, of late years, to deterioration in the quality of the music that is composed for popular singing in the churches, and that many of the literary compositions that are now set to music are far below the standard, and lack that spiritual quality which ought to be the hall-mark of every good hymn. Some of them verge very closely upon doggerel." It was also stated that "at a recent gathering of the representatives of one of our leading Protestant denominations, the subject of our decadent hymnology was discussed with the utmost candor. It was the opinion of the speakers as a whole, that reform could not come too soon."

In response to our invitation, the following letters on the subject have been received:

The "Danger Line" of Secularism

I have read with much interest your article on "Reform in Sacred Song," recognizing as I do the need of reform along the lines of both hymns and music—the need of hymns that are true to the spirit and teachings of the Word of God, and that will be owned and blest of him in the worship of the sanctuary and the work of the church. The power to write music suitable to express and enforce the spiritual meaning of the hymns is one of those gifts to be earnestly coveted by those whose privilege it is to serve in this important department of the Master's work.

Only a few years ago, the metrical version of the Psalms as used by the Psalm-singing churches, was regarded by some as too heavy for popular use in a Gospel hymn book; but to-day, such a book is hardly considered well balanced without some selections from these grand "Songs of the Ages." I look forward with hope and expectation to the not distant future, when the weak and unworthy among the hymns shall more and more give place to the strong, spiritual and Scriptural, which shall abide.

About the music, that is suitable for all the various departments, from the sanctuary to the mission hall, it is not so easy to write. That in the secular character of the music, the danger line is too often crossed, can not be denied. Reform is urgent, and will be appreciated by Christian people generally. This should be a stimulus to the best efforts on the part of those who have any share in the exalted privilege of preparing hymns or music for any department of church work or worship. JAMES MCGRANAHAN.

A Sweeping Reform Desirable

If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can only succeed in arousing public interest to the necessity of a real reform in our hymnology, it will have rendered valuable public service. I have often been surprised, not to say shocked, at the irreverence of adapting to the praises of God such tunes as "Suwannee River," "Annie Laurie," "Sweet Marie," "Die Wacht am Rhine," "Robin Adair," and "Auld Lang Syne." Yet it is a positive fact—and a pitiful one, too—that these tunes, and others of the same sort, are actually to be found in some of our so-called "Sacred Song Books," and are sung by people who, I really believe, are ashamed of such "worship," and would rather have something truly reverential instead. The fault lies with the composers, "adapters" and publishers. In the recent church conference mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, such hymns as "Shall We Gather at the River," "A Little Talk with Jesus," "God Be With You," etc., were mentioned. If anyone wishes to know the true movement of these tunes, let him try them to quick time, and note the difference. I recall at least one march, which might very well be played in a ball room, that was widely sung at summer conventions lately, and its "boom' boom' boom' boom' boom de-dooden-day" was the reverse of inspirational.

You may safely set it down as a fact that the people do n't go to church or meeting to sing marches or slowed-up dance-tunes, or to persuade themselves that the injection of social songs that were worn threadbare over the drinking-cups in bygone days, is a desirable adjunct to the worship of God.

Keep up the good work until all the opera bouffe is thrown out of our hymn books.

New York. H.

Reform Needed—But How?

I am in favor of improvement in our hymnology, and am doing what I can in that interest. But improvement must be a matter of growth. One cannot say to another, "The hymn and tune that you are singing is bad; you must stop using it." Or, on the other hand, "This hymn and tune is good; you should use it." The other may properly answer, "This I like best; it helps me more than the one you recommend; this is a free country; and more than that, Christ has made me free to worship him according to my taste in such matters."

While I see and hear a good deal of music that is too empty, or even silly, for me, yet I see an extreme on the other hand that is away beyond the abilities of the people. They cannot and will not use the high class music that is printed in what are called the finer hymnals. Neither do I see a remedy for our deplorable state, musically, in the resolutions of synods or in editorials that set forth the extremes that exist. The people must be taught. If those who want the music of our churches reformed will devise a plan for sending music teachers among the churches as missionaries of the "better music," the work will be speedily done. J. H. FILLMORE.

Cincinnati, O.

A "Two-Step" and a "Break Down"

I have carefully read your article, entitled, "Reform in Sacred Song," and agree that there are some valuable points discussed therein, though we are at a loss to know just what you mean by doggerel music. However, in regard to the "two-step" and "break down," it all depends on how you apply this. Recently, the writer sang a song in a large gathering, the chorus of which was "two step" music, and after singing two verses, the request was given for any who wished to do so, to join in the chorus after the third verse, and a great many ladies did so and only a few gentlemen. The remark was made, "It is wonderful how readily ladies will catch on to a two-step." Some of the gentlemen in this gathering seemed to be slow in doing so. Of course it created laughter. Then the remark was made, that it was a blessed thing to catch on to the "two-step," as salvation depended on that; namely one out of several other tunes. Christ came off the winning side, the other on to the scaffold. I also overhear the other night the following: That the request was made, How many men were on the ladies in a "two step" and sing that chorus with them? Many hands went up and when the invitation was given, some forty persons came forward for prayer and there was a regular "break down" among those who came forward as singers. And, mark God, many took the "two step," going out of the meetings, saved by faith in Christ, having made the step of unbelief into the step of faith. BILHORN BROTHERS.

Irreverent Music Out of Place

The field of hymnology stands in need of a thorough weeding, and I am in cordial sympathy with this movement. Many of the so-called hymns of the day, both in words and music, are more calculated to cast ridicule upon things sacred than to lead the mind to devotion. Waltz-time is much in vogue, and we may expect rag time next, if it has not cropped out already. I know of a pol-ished Te Deum that is most irreverential, because of its lilting jauntiness, and I have frequently heard the well known hymn, "Just as I am, without one plea" sung to the tune of the "Wedding March" from Lohengrin. These are but samples; many more could be given.

Against "Ragtime" and Doggerel

I am in hearty accord with your movement for reform in our "present hymnology." I am opposed to the use of "ragtime" or any other doggerel or irreverent music to sacred words. H. P. DAKES.

Philadelphia, Pa.

The Test of a Good Hymn

I am in most cordial sympathy with the effort being made to raise the standard of modern hymnology. I have no sympathy with those who are forever decrying the character of the more popular Gospel hymns of a generation ago. They were the outgrowth of a popular demand for the time, and the very fact of their popularity was in itself a protest against a certain class of church music which lacks in vigor and inspiration. At the same time, I believe that this class of music has served its day and generation, and that the whole tendency of the last fifteen years has been to raise the standard of Gospel hymns.

The value of a hymn, it seems to me, is not to be found in its possibilities for vocal gymnastics, but in its power to express the deepest emotions of human souls. It must combine a quality which I know of no other word to express than that of "singing-ableness." But at the same time, its music must conserve the Spirit of the words and should merely be a means to convey the words, whether they be in praise or prayer, worship or thanksgiving. W. R. MOODY.

The Quartette Choir the Church's Bane

With regard to "Reform in Sacred Song," I would say, speaking as a musician and as one who appreciates the highest in the art, that I am not wishing to censure that church music, as a whole, is quite as bad to-day as it is represented to be. I would not say that there is no room and no need for improvement, no one would make such an absurd claim as that. But, why is it that the wonderful improvement that has been made in the last half century, especially in the last thirty years in church music, is not recognized by some of our writers and speakers? TEMPLES VISIBLE AND INVISIBLE

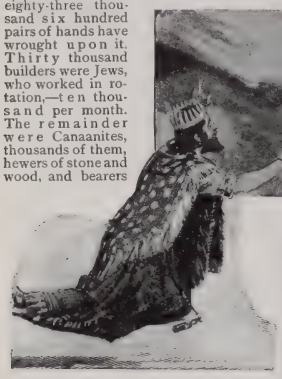
❋ The Dedication of Solomon's Temple

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC 13
I. KINGS 8: 1-11, 62, 63

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--PSALM. 122: 1: "I WAS GLAD WHEN THEY SAID UNTO ME, LET US GO INTO THE HOUSE OF THE LORD"

"GRACE, grace unto it." It is completed; the marvelous Temple, which had its inception in the loyal, loving heart of King David, the pattern of which was given him by the Spirit, the erection of which was committed to King Solomon by the express word of the Lord. One hundred and eighty-three thousand six hundred pairs of hands have wrought upon it. Thirty thousand builders were Jews, who worked in rotation,—ten thousand per month. The remainder were Canaanites, thousands of them, hewers of stone and wood, and bearers of burdens. Three thousand, six hundred of the builders were overseers, some of them Canaanites, the others Israelites. For seven and a half years this vast company of men had worked side by side. They have done their work in reverent silence. The sound of a hammer, axe, or any tool of iron has not been heard (I. Kings 6: 7). They have also built the temple in a short space of time compared with the time occupied in the erection of other renowned houses of worship, for example, the Cathedral of Cologne, which was more than five hundred years in building, and St. Peter's at Rome, whose erection stretched over three hundred years, and the Duomo at Florence, which grew for four hundred years.



"SPREAD FORTH HIS HANDS TOWARD HEAVEN"

It has been less than forty years since King David, through the prophet Nathan, expressed his wish to God to build this Temple. It has been only eleven and a half years since the commission was given to Solomon to build it. He did not begin the building until four years after his coronation, because he wanted to thoroughly establish his kingdom and unify his people for this supreme effort.

Let us walk around about the Temple and examine it. We choose the day of its dedication, in October, 1004 B.C. The Temple has been completed about one year, but the dedication has been deferred, so that it may occur during the Feast of Tabernacles, when people from every part of the land would be gathered in Jerusalem. We find ourselves on the vast Temple platform, which has an area of twelve acres, on the top of Mount Moriah. We have entered from the east, through a gate in the wall of stone and cedar which surrounds the outer court. We walk through a cloister on the east side of the court, which is free to all people, and here we find the crowd dense. We see before us another court, which we may not enter, but as the partition wall is low we can discern that the court is filled with white-robed priests. We see the great brazen laver and the large brazen altar, and near it a high platform, on which we are told King Solomon is to stand. Within this court rises the Temple, a dream in marble, with a roof of shining gold, crowning its snowy whiteness. We note the two great shining pillars of brass that strengthen and adorn the portico. And yet with all its magnificence, the Temple seems small to us, only one hundred and twenty feet long, by sixty feet wide, and forty-five feet high, the portico rising much higher as a facade. But we are impressed with the fact that size does not make greatness.

We hear music in the distance, harps and lutes and cymbals and voices, and as we move toward the west side of the court we see a procession of four thousand musicians and singers, all coming through the Tyropean valley, arrayed in white, singing the praises of the God, whose "mercy endureth forever." They are accompanied by priests and Levites, also dressed in white, who are carrying the golden candlestick, the table of shewbread, the golden altar of incense, and something wound with a blue cloth, which we are told is the precious Ark of the Covenant. Others are carrying the golden boards, and the hangings which made up the ancient Tabernacle constructed by Moses. We are told that these precious relics are to be sacredly kept in the new Temple. At the door the procession halts, until the Ark can be carried in, and placed in the Holy of Holies. We were told that the priests who carried it there would not be permitted to see it again, for only the High Priest could enter there, and he only once a year. God's presence came with the Ark, for immediately the whole Temple was filled and enveloped in a cloud, as when God had moved before his people in a cloud by day when they were marching through the wilderness to the Promised Land. King Solomon, on his high platform, in sight of all the people, looking toward the most Holy Place, blessed God for his manifest presence. Then he turned and faced the people, and called upon them to bless God for all the way in which he had led them, and the people stood and praised God. Then, in the words of a never-to-be-forgotten prayer, kneeling low with his hands spread toward heaven, King Solomon prays to God, beseeching him to accept as his own house the Temple which they had built.

At the conclusion of his prayer, almost in a moment, the Temple glows as with fire. It is the shining presence of the Lord, who had come to take possession of his own. Awe falls upon the whole congregation, and the stillness is awful, followed by a tumultuous burst of praise to God from all throats. A few closing words spoken by King Solomon, and then the offering of sacrifices to God begins, which are to last a week. Not the whole animals are to be burned, but only the fat upon the inwards for a peace offering, the other parts furnishing food for the people, who thus ate with God in restored friendship, is completed at-one-ment. This is the very soul of Temple and Church alike, restored fellowship with God, and any "meeting house" where man does not really meet God, is but the tomb of a dead church. Better real fellowship with God and with his people without a building, than the most elegant church building without this soul of divine fellowship.

Illustration and Application

The Bible presents a progression of five kinds of temples, four of them types and promises of the fifth: First, the temple of nature, in which Abel's and Abraham's altars were raised; second, the temple of stone, built by Solomon, rebuilt by Zerubbabel and Herod; third, the temple of Christ's body, in which the divine presence was again manifest; fourth, the temple of the individual Christian's body, to be "filled with the Spirit;" fifth, the spiritual temple of the Church, in which every true Christian is "a living stone," while Christ is the corner stone.

"SOLOMON STOOD BEFORE THE ALTAR OF THE LORD"

In all these temples, the story of this lesson reminds us: (1) God's law is to be in the Holy of Holies as his revelation of love; (2) The sacrifice of prayer is to open man's way to God; (3) The Spirit of God is to be manifested to man.

Speaking of the primitive temple of nature, we recall the devout words of the celebrated French chemist, Louis Pasteur: "Posterity will one day laugh at the foolishness of the modern materialistic philosophers. The more I study nature, the more I stand amazed at the works of the Creator. I pray while I am engaged in my work in the laboratory."

"Nature, the kind old nurse,
Took the child upon her knee
And said, this is a story book
Thy Father has written for thee."

What a rebuke and correction to our common thought and feeling about God's law there is in the fact that it was the only thing put in the Ark of the Covenant in the Most Holy Place! This accords with what we have often said of the Law as the greatest revelation of God's love, excepting only the Cross, by which we are recovered from the sin of disobeying that Law. With such loving awe as the Jew thought of the Most Holy Place as the very throne-room of God, should we think of God's law as the embodiment of his love and wisdom and power.

An idiot boy was frequently badly treated by other boys and ridiculed by older people, and being utterly unable to defend himself, he would simply say, "Ah! God looked at that." It made such an impression on a young lady that she says, in all her later years of life she has never seen any injustice done, but there would come to her mind again the lad and his graphic sermon, "God looked at that."

God's love forbids us nothing that would harm us. A fruit supposed to bear the mark of Eve's teeth is one of the many botanical curiosities of Ceylon. The tree on which it grows is known by the significant name of "the forbidden fruit," or "Eve's apple tree." The blossom has a very pleasant scent. The fruit is beautiful, and hangs from the tree in a peculiar manner. Orange on the outside and deep crimson within, each fruit has the appearance of having had a piece bitten out of it, but it is poisonous.

There is this much of real truth in this living parable that only poison fruit is "forbidden fruit," He who made all the delicious fruits of the earth is no ascetic, and would cut off no real joy from his children. His laws are but guide-boards to joy. The reverence with which we should connect God with the moral law is beautifully illustrated in an incident we have used before, but which is so timely here that it may well be recalled—the African native called before Stanley charged with stealing a gun belonging to his expedition. The frightened savage could only exclaim, "I am a son of God; I would not steal." And so it proved. He was a missionary convert, and had found the gun where it had been dropped. What a watchword this child of nature gives us for interpreting the Decalogue reverently and effectively. I am a son of God, I would not worship idols. I am a son of God, I would not profane his name. I am a son of God, I would not profane his day. And so through it all. He surely kept the Decalogue in his Holy of Holies.

One day a little child was slowly making its way up the stairs and the mother down below said, "Come here, baby; mamma wants you." And baby replied, "I wants myself," and went right on. So when God wants us for some unselfish service, the sinful heart replies, "I want myself. I want to be my own master, to have my own way, to do my own will." Absalom wanted himself, in disobedience to his earthly and heavenly father, and came to failure for both worlds, as is usual with those who set their own wills above God's will. If we are to build a beautiful life, God's law must be reverently, joyously enshrined in our heart of hearts. Dr. Merrill E. Gates gives to young men this message: "Only by doing hard things heartily can we gain power." "To do the thing you know you ought to do at the time when you know you ought to do it, whether you feel like it or not—this will insure you success."

In the ancient temple there were five kinds of offerings or sacrifices, of which only the form has changed, the substance remaining to this day. First, sinful man needs the sin offering, a substitute who dies in his stead, that he may be forgiven. Second, the trespass offering makes special confession of unconscious sins. Third, the whole burnt offering expresses complete consecration, unreserved devotion to God's service in life and death. Fourth, the peace offering pictures restored fellowship with God by eating with him at his altar table. Fifth, the thank-offering expresses gratitude for blessings, temporal and spiritual, and devotion of property to God's service. Worship to-day should include all these elements.

This lesson on the first temple might well be devoted to the uses and abuses of worship. Worship is here exalted as important, in that fourteen days are devoted to it by a whole nation, the dedication beginning seven days before the Feast of Tabernacles and continuing through it. It is related that some converted Africans finding no privacy for prayer in their small, crowded huts, betook themselves to secluded places in the forest nearby. In the course of time paths became worn from each man's hut to his prayer-place. The spiritual condition could often be told by the condition of the path leading to any individual's place of retirement. Occasionally, one of these native Christians would become lukewarm, and not travel his path so much as in other days. Then his companions would sometimes remind him with the words, "Brother, the grass grows in your path."

Mother's Moulding Hand

CHARACTER is not formed in a day. The mother beginning her work, when her babies are in the cradle, impresses her personality upon her sons and daughters, little by little, with unceasing, yet often, with unconscious effort. A mother who is deeply pious, and whose spiritual life is fed by constant communion with God, will impress her children with the reality of the Christian's hope. What the Scriptures call the "walk and conversation" of a consistent disciple, has a lasting effect on the young people in a home, seeing daily through successive years, the sweet humility and steadfast strength that are the marks of true Christian living. "My mother," said an eminent minister of the Gospel, "brought us all into the Kingdom, one by one, simply by the fidelity with which she followed her Saviour."

We would not underrate the power and influence of a father in his family. But the world claims the father, while the mother remains in the shelter of the home. Business demands his presence and attention. He must go forth and labor, while his wife abides by the "stuff," and trains the children.

Said the daughter of a world-renowned evangelist, a man in whose crown must blaze whole galaxies of stars: "It was mother who brought us up, while father was converting sinners on both sides of the sea." It is mother always who brings up the children. She trains them in the little courtesies, and in the practice of great principles. As she is gracious, considerate, broad-minded, and lovable, so are they. As she is reverential and full of faith, so are they.

The mother need not be disheartened by apparent failure, nor by the slow growth of the plants of righteousness in the home garden. She is responsible only for daily endeavor, not for immediate success. Her moulding touches are so soft, so gentle, so delicate, that only God and the angels know what they cost her. Into the lives of her children she is pouring her own life. Long after she has gone to the home where the flowers never fade, and the joys are never shadowed, her children will remember how her face shone when she came from the closet where she knelt and prayed, and how her Bible opened of its own accord to the chapters she had read so often that she knew them by heart.

"Strength and honor are her clothing, and she shall rejoice in time to come. She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children rise up and call her blessed. Her husband also, and he praiseth her. Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all."

AGE AND YOUTH

Age, with wisdom brought by years,
Age, with knowledge bought by tears,
Sitteth down in calm content;
Youth, uplifting thoughts of cheer,
Sweet and smiling, draweth near,
Like some gentle angel sent,
Bringing gift and bringing grace,
Here behold them face to face.

A Housemaids' Union

The woman who does her own work, and is therefore independent of hired help, is likely to be on the winning side in times that are looming large on the horizon.

We are told that in Holyoke, Mass., and in New Haven, Conn., and probably in other places, the domestics who perform household labor are organizing, as the laborers of the other sex do, with a view to regulating their hours of work, securing more privileges, and obtaining higher wages. In most autocratic fashion, the sapient leaders of this new movement decree that a maid's hours shall be from 6 A.M. to 1 P.M., and from 5 P.M. to 7 P.M. That work in hours beyond this allotment shall be paid for at fifteen or twenty cents an hour, and if at night, at double this price. A cook is to do nothing but cook. Laundry work must be sent out, or paid for at an extra rate. The family are to accommodate their comings and goings to the discretion of their hired help, and housekeepers will be in a fair way to understand why Solomon predicted woe to the land when a servant reigned over it.

The counter current of course, will sweep employers into unions of their own, to resist the tyranny of those who condescend to be employed. A system of fines will doubtless correspond to the system of extra fees. Guests will cease to bestow tips, for it is not to be supposed that the lofty personages who drop dish cloth and pudding stick at precisely the stroke of one o'clock, will so far demean themselves as to accept a gratuity. Ladies will exact expert service, and blunders in cooking or waiting will no longer be amiably condoned. Also, they will keep a strict and rigid account of breakages and leakages, and demand restitution in money for these, when wages are paid.

The old pleasant relation of mistress and maid, which has existed, and still exists in many a household, will go by the board, if the Housemaid's Union inaugurates a successful new departure. For housework, except in very large establishments, cannot be done during fixed hours. It is unlike factory work, and unlike work at the typewriter, or behind the counter. That employers are sometimes thoughtless and unreasonable must be admitted, just as we admit the fact that servants are often incompetent and irresponsible. But looking over the wide field, the agitation of this subject, from the standpoint of the labor union is unwholesome, and will breed contention and ill feeling. It can do little good, if any. The relation, though a business one, must be founded upon friendliness, and there must be reciprocal concessions. In the meantime, blessed are those capable mothers and daughters who do their own work, have tidy kitchens, and unmutilated china, bread that is fit for a man's eating, and hours of tranquil resting when their work is done.

HONEY

Just a bit of honey on the daily bread,
Just a waft of perfume on the path we tread.
Just a taste of sweetness in the bitter brew,
That is dashed too deeply with the poignant rue.
Just a winning patience when the day is long,
Just a cheerer lifting of the pilgrim's song.
Just a thought of heaven; earth will soon be o'er,
Oh, the fadeless flowers on that other shore!
Just a bit of honey, in the cup we take,
Just a little sweetness in the bread we break.

The Weekly Mending

"SISTER, I haven't a pair of stockings in my bureau drawers! What becomes of my stockings?"

Sister, half asleep, scrambles out of bed in a hurry, and, opening her door on a crack, cries: "Here, Joe!" In her hand is a pair of socks, neatly darned.

"I meant to have put those in your room last night," she says in a tone of apology.

"But I don't understand," continues the aggrieved voice of the brother, "why I always have to wake you before I can get a pair of socks. There ought to be a pile in my room. I'm sure I have stockings enough."

"Oh, don't argue, Joe. Just dress yourself and be happy. I'll mend up the rest of your wardrobe today."

Going back into her room, sister's eye falls upon her mending basket. It is a sight! Heaped up, pressed down, and running over with garments that need a stitch, or a patch, or a little renovation. And how she dislikes mending! Loathes it, she exclaims after the exaggerated manner of girls. Poor sister! If she would be systematic, and never let this work's work slop over into next week, there would be an end of her annoyance, and of the reiterated family protests because of their inconvenience and her delay. Mending is not as delightful as reading, but if any one assumes it as a weekly task, the better plan is to do it at once. Fine mending is a rare accomplishment, rarer than one thinks for the women who succeed in needlecraft are in the minority. When one sees the beautiful darning done by nuns in convents and taught to their pupils, when one looks at the neatness with which the grandmother takes up her stitches, and makes as good as new the old stocking or the worn garment, one sees that in this art, as in others, there is a chance to show patience and skill, and a talent for finishing what one begins.

If boys are taught to do their own simple mending, and provided with needles, thread, and the rest of the sewing outfit, a good deal of domestic squabbling is prevented. A mother who has tried this scheme, and turned it to work to a charm, recommends it to other mothers and housekeepers.

Counting our Blessings

"The pipes broke in the middle of the night, and when we came downstairs we found the sitting room flooded. It was awfully vexatious," said the girl, who was not at all the most picturesque adverb one could think of. "But what do you think mother said? 'Any water on the library?'"

"I cannot imagine," answered the listener.

"In the midst of the flood, when we were busy with buckets and sponges, she suddenly looked up, beaming, and said, 'girls, count your blessings.'"

"It must have surprised you," the friend remarked.

"Yes, in any one but mother. She always has to say something to the last straw, and some good thing, she is sure that something is in it."

Blessed little mother. She was always the biggest success in the home, with her optimism and courage.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Anxious, Hartford, Conn. If my business partner does such things that he may be regarded as a crazy man, or if he gets himself involved personally in money matters (not the firm, remember) can I be held responsible for his acts?

You should get legal advice on the matter, as it may prove highly important. The insanity of a partner is usually considered sufficient to justify a decree of dissolution, but only after the person has been adjudged insane. As long as you carry on business together and continue to divide the profits, you will very likely be compelled to bear a share of any losses that may arise through his eccentricities. If he becomes a bankrupt, and goes through the courts, that, of course, would have the effect of dissolving the partnership.

Rev. J. S., Sparta, Okla. A man by the name of Rogers (John, I believe) was burned at the stake in the reign of Queen Mary, on account of his belief. He wrote a long poem, and exhorted his wife and children to be faithful. I would like to know—1. What he believed, that caused his death? 2. Who condemned and who executed him? 3. Are any of his family known to live now, and where?

John Rogers, the martyr, the associate of Tyndale and Coverdale, was a well-known pastor in London. On Sunday, August 6, 1553, three days after the entry of Queen Mary into London, he denounced Roman Catholicism from the pulpit. He was arrested and imprisoned in his own house; was afterwards removed to Newgate, was tried and condemned before Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, and was finally burned at Smithfield, February 4, 1555, for his sturdy adherence to the Protestant faith. It is possible that his descendants may still be found in England.

Reader, Abbeville, Ala. Why is it that all persons do not dream? I have heard of several Jews, who claim that they never had a dream in their lives, and the subject has created some comment, so I write to get your solution of the matter.

Dreams are common to the entire human race, savage or civilized. There may be exceptional cases of abnormal minds that do not dream in sleep, but we never heard of them. Certainly all normal minds dream at times. Even the lower animals dream, if the assurances of authorities on the subject are to be accepted.

A Reader, Wisconsin. Is it becoming for a Christian to wear silk apparel (not gaudy) if means afford such?

We do not consider the wearing of a silk gown wicked, if you can afford it, and provided that in purchasing it you do not permit any really worthy object to suffer. A sensible person will draw the line between dressing for mere vanity and dressing agreeably with your means and position in life.

Reader, Clifton Springs, N. Y. A husband obtained by wicked means a divorce from his wife, but she would not stoop to obtain divorce from him, and let it go by default. She has a small property and no children, and wishes to know if the husband, now married to another wife, can legally claim any portion of the property. The divorce was given in Michigan in 1896.

Lawyer G. H. Crawford, of 32 Liberty street, New York, to whom this was submitted, replies as follows: "Though the facts are not fully stated, my opinion is that if the divorced woman referred to lives in this State, and her property is here, her former husband has, and can acquire no rights in her property. What might happen if she went to Michigan with her property, must be determined by a Michigan lawyer. My very strong impression is that the former husband would have no rights in the property even there."

Miss M. H., Wellsburg, W. Va. Please tell me something about the Blarney Stone?

In the wall of Blarney Castle, near Cork, Ireland, is a stone, difficult of access. It is said that any one who kisses that stone becomes endowed with the gift of persuasive language, or, in the colloquial phraseology, "gets the gift of blarney." Visitors go to great pains to kiss the stone, which is set in the face of the wall, and considerably beyond the reach of a person unassisted.

"Sorrowing One," Germantown, Pa. Why does not God answer prayer for power to overcome a besetting sin? I have prayed to be delivered, but get no help.

Are you sure that it is help that you are looking for? Is it not rather the working of a kind of miracle by which you will be relieved of all further struggle? Even that kind of prayer is sometimes answered, but not often. More frequently God grants power for a man to use, if he will do so. We have no right to expect God to work a miracle on our behalf. But when he sees a tempted man—whether the temptation comes from within or without—making a sincere and determined effort to overcome, he hears that man's prayer for help and extends it to him. If you prove your sincerity by your own struggle God will help you to victory and you will be morally stronger for having fought.

P. D. L., Topeka, Kan. Is it right for an active Christian to go a-boating on the Sabbath day as a pleasure?

The question is absurd upon its face. No active Christian, not even the poorest kind of Christian, would hold himself guiltless if he so desecrated the Sabbath.

M. B., Trenton, N. J. Do you not think we acted overhastily, as a government, in recognizing Panama and in sustaining the new republic against Colombia?

It is an interesting question. Colombia had been clearly led to understand that the Hay-Herran treaty—which was an eminently fair and liberal one—was the very limit of our liberality; yet the Colombian legislators ignored the warning and determined to exact from us a price beyond all reason and justice. They deliberately killed the treaty. They left us free to act, and when the Isthmus seceded and declared its independenc we had a perfect right to accord it recognition. The worl needs the canal, and it was a fortunate thing, as it now turn out, that Colombia did so overreach itself as to reject th treaty, since it enables us to build the canal on better terms an without delay. Haste was necessary, as it always is in in portant emergencies. Those who are now criticising our Gov ernment for acting as it did, will no doubt see the matter in d.fferent light as all the facts come out. It must be remem bered, too, that under the treaty of 1846, we have the right t act as peace-officer on the Isthmus, and to forbid Panamanians Colombians, or any other people, from indulging in armed con flict in that territory.

Susan C., Aguilar, Colo. Would Christ have come into the world i man had not sinned?

Who can tell? Though there would not have been the same reason for his coming, yet it is not inconceivable that he might have come for other reasons. These speculations are fruitless, as the finite cannot comprehend the infinite.

Jennie L., Allegheny City. By what rule or method may one deter mine, in the case of doubt, whether an amusement or recreation i legitimate for one who professes to lead a Christian life?

There can be no absolute rule in the matter, though the test of certain principles may very well be applied in such cases Ask yourself: 1. Is this proposed amusement physically o intellectually clean, wholesome, recreative, or is it baneful and dissipating? 2. Is it in harmony with and conducive to my desire for spiritual development or will it retard that develop ment? 3. Does conscience approve it and would Christ have approved it? 4. Even admitting that it will not harm me per sonally, will it exert an injurious or pernicious influence on others who may follow my example? But, probably best of all, when you have an honest doubt about any amusement, you may set it down as wisdom to leave it alone without further questioning.

Inquirer, Scranton, Pa. Is the conscience always right? If not, what guide have we as to conduct?

The conscience must be educated. It is often warped by ignorance, or misled by heredity and association, or stifled by our own interests. The study of the Word of God, with earnest prayer for light, will aid in bringing conscience into a right state. A man ought to act according to his conscience, but always with a mind open to conviction.

How a Poor Boy Became a Philanthropist

The Life Story of William Quarrier, the Friend of Thousands of Homeless Lads

STARVING with cold, pinched with hunger, and with little prospect of a change of condition before him, a boy, William Quarrier, stood on the High Street of Glasgow, one day, some sixty years ago. As the crowds of well-dressed and well-fed people passed by him, with not a thought of the little ragged boy, Quarrier at that moment made a vow, that if ever he was as these people were with money in their pockets to spend as they liked, he would spend it in helping those who could not help themselves.

That vow has been nobly kept. The boy had not only a kind heart to prompt the thought, but a fund of grit and business ability behind his humble exterior, that enabled him to carry his vow into effect. Through his sole efforts 13,000 children have been rescued from the neglect, and worse than neglect, of the slums, and have been put in the way of making an honest living.

All through his life, William Quarrier was a determined man, some have even said a headstrong man. But it is well for his charges that he was that kind of man. A man of another stamp would have faltered under the magnitude of his undertaking, and under the apathy or hostility of various sections of the public. In his later life, all the superabundant energies were needed in the organization and execution of his schemes. In his boyhood they found an outlet in physical channels. He worked very hard at his apprenticeships in Paisley; and even out of his long hours was ever on the move. At five years of age the young boy was assisting his mother and eldest sister to do "fine sewing," by which they made a precarious livelihood. At six he had started in life as a hand in a pin factory. It was an age innocent of factory legislation, and the boy worked between sixty and seventy hours a week for the handsome sum of one shilling. A year later he became apprenticed to a shoemaker, and this was his calling until his philanthropic tasks demanded his full attendance.

THE LATE WILLIAM QUARRIER

Mr. Quarrier had made the resolve which directed the line of his life work when he was still a boy. The resolution was made in an instant; but it was as firm as if it had taken him a year to make up his mind. It was again an incident of a few moments' duration that finally started him upon the work he had set before himself. He had begun business on his own account in Glasgow, and the days of his own poverty were over. When he had shut up shop one evening and was making for his home, he was arrested by the crying of a poor lad. He stopped, questioned the boy, and elicited the story that he was a match-seller, and that a strange boy had, by a ruse, succeeded in stealing from him his stock-in-trade.

Mr. Quarrier gave the boy sufficient to renew his supply of matches and passed on. But the incident had kindled afresh the resolve to do something for the lives of poor and outcast boys.

He wrote to the Glasgow Herald a letter above the pseudonym of "Shoeblack," proposing the starting in Glasgow of a "Shoeblacks' Brigade" such as already existed in London, offering to give both of his time and his money if a committee were gotten together in the cause. His letter brought kindly answers and proved the beginning of his philanthropic work.

Mr. Quarrier was a strong believer in the efficacy of prayer, and believed himself directly guided by Providence in his philanthropic labors. He was fond of quoting a particular instance of where his needs were met in a remarkable manner. When he began sending children to Canada he needed ten pounds to pay for each. There were seven children on one occasion whom he was anxious to send out. The time of the boat's sailing was near at hand, but no money had been forthcoming for their passage.

Mr. Quarrier held a special prayer-meeting on the subject, on a Monday evening. On the Wednesday a gentleman called upon him at his place of business.

"Are you Mr. Quarrier?" he asked.

"Yes," said Mr. Quarrier.

"I understand that you are interested in the Orphan Homes?"

Mr. Quarrier said that he was. The stranger then handed him fifty pounds, as an anonymous contribution from "Two Friends," and would not give his own name. On the next day twenty other pounds were received as a special donation, and the seventy pounds required was thus made up. Mr. Quarrier, in fact, acknowledged that he made no effort to get money for his schemes. He never made a formal application to the public for money. He simply found that he never had any trouble in the matter, for money came in from donors, known and anonymous, just when it was wanted, and, as Mr. Quarrier firmly believed, in direct answer to prayer.

The philanthropist's scheme of establishing "Homes" for his boys in the country was a wonderful conception.

The Homes at Bridge of Weir comprise sixty-two buildings, and contain a population of the respectable dimensions of 1,400. Mr. Quarrier's long, laborious, and fruitful life is now ended. He passed away at Bridge of Weir three weeks ago, greatly mourned by all who knew him.

Composer H. P. Danks Dead

HART PEASE DANKS, a noted writer of ballads and sacred music, died in Philadelphia, Nov. 19th, in his seventieth year. He was born, April 6, 1834, at New Haven, Conn. His parents removed to Saratoga Springs, N. Y., in 1842. Here he first studied music and sang soprano in the Methodist Church. His teacher was Dr. Whiting, a noted physician and musician. His first musical composition was a simple hymn-tune, called "Lake Street," published in Bradbury's Jubilee in 1854. His first songs were published in 1859. He removed to New York in 1865, and was connected with the sheet music house of Wm. Hall & Son, and has resided in New York mostly since that year. In 1866 he wrote the song, "Don't be angry with me, Darling," which was a great success and was sung everywhere. In 1871-2 he wrote "Sweet Sounds among the gold," which it is said has had the largest sale of any copyright song ever published in the United States. His sacred songs have had a very extensive sale and are found in many works up to the present time. Of his later sacred songs "No night there," and "Will there be light for me," (the latter of which was composed for and first published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD) have been most popular. He was the author of an operetta, several anthem collections, and about 1,500 songs and services in sheet form. He was well known as a concert basso, singing with such artists as Anna Bishop, Maria Brainard and others of equal note, as well as a choir leader, conductor of musical societies, etc. His death was sudden and unexpected. He leaves a wife, two daughters and a son to mourn his loss.

"Force-thoughts"

By "SUNNY JIM"

DO you know that you get a new skin every month or six weeks—from four to twelve new skins for every gown or new suit of clothes you buy?

Do you know that your finger-nails are completely renewed every six months, and your toe-nails once a year, and that your eyelashes last about a hundred days?

¶I grew up with the popular notion that one's body was completely renewed every seven years; in reality, the change takes place within about thirty months; and the only part that undergoes but little transformation is the enamel of your teeth.

No wonder, then, that the food you eat is the all-important thing. From it was made all you are to-day—and to-morrow's breakfast has a mighty big bearing on the way you'll decide an important matter two months from now!

¶And you know it's not the amount of nutriment in the food but the amount that is available that counts. "Force" as a food containing the highest percentage of nutriment so far as materials are concerned, and the scientific cooking process renders all this nutriment ready for immediate transformation into brain and muscle.

It's because it is so easily digested that it helps us to

Be Sunny.

¶Perhaps my book would help you—it's about "Force" and something else. I wrote it myself.

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. It is a really local experience, with the names only slightly veiled, and the facts easily recognizable. The great audience sits spellbound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told. Over three thousand persons sign the pledge, as the result of the story. An explosion wrecks the Beacon office and press, and injures George. Douglas pluckily continues publication, with the aid of friends. Hopes brighten, and the outlook for the revived Beacon, and the cause it represents, gradually improves. The little temperance group at Colby hears of the approaching wedding of Esther and Douglas, which is shortly afterward celebrated very quietly. The women of Colby begin a vigorous temperance crusade.

"I WOULD want you to do anything that in your judgment was best," she answered quickly. There had never been a minute in Esther's life since she gave her heart to Douglas when she had not had the most implicit confidence in him, and the most calm and unquestioned faith in his career. She would have thought just the same of him if the Beacon had failed instead of prospering as it had.

After another pause, Esther spoke again.

"Mrs. Edwards and Mrs. Vernon want me to join the League. Are you willing?"

"Why, yes. Of course."

"We are going to hold sidewalk prayer-meetings in front of the saloons next week."

"Do you think that will do any good?" Douglas asked gently.

"Why not? We women cannot vote. What is left for us but to pray, and pray, and teach our children, and then trust God."

"I don't object," Douglas answered in a low tone. "But I don't believe it will do much good."

Esther did not answer, but when Douglas had gone down to the office on some special errand a little later that evening, she dropped her work on the table and went into the other room to kneel down by the child and pour out her strong mother-heart to God.

It was Tuesday of the following week that Colby witnessed a sight new to it then, but duplicated afterwards in hundreds of towns all over the State.

About twenty women, nearly all of them mothers, and most of them from the older group of church women, met at the Methodist Church for an afternoon prayer-meeting, and then, under the leadership of Mrs. Vernon and Mrs. Edwards, they went out together and walked down the sidewalk to the Wayside Inn, singing as they went:

Stand up, stand up for Jesus,
Ye soldiers of the cross—

Down in front of the saloon they all stopped and kneeled down. Douglas and Quits, standing in the door of the Beacon office, which had been moved back near its former location, looking up the street together with every merchant whose store was on the street, saw the proprietor of the saloon come to the door and stand there looking at the women. They saw Mrs. Vernon rise and begin to talk to him. He went back into the building and shut the door. After another hymn the little company moved down to Jake Lawson's. Douglas could distinguish Esther's face among the elderly women, and his heart went out towards her in a silent prayer for her and their boy.

Jake Lawson came to the door and motioned to the women to move on. They still kneeled, however, and Mrs. Edwards was praying, Esther kneeling beside her, when a thing happened that sent Douglas and Quits up the street as if driven by a great cry for help. A devil of anger was pounding at Douglas' heart, and as he ran he was beside himself with rage, and the primitive man leaped red-handed to the front and swept on to do its worst.

CHAPTER IX.

BEFORE Douglas and Quits had ran over half the distance between the Beacon office and Jake's place, they were joined by scores of men, who had been watching the women, and had seen the same sight that had filled Douglas with fury.

After telling the women to move on, Jake Lawson had gone back into his saloon, while the women continued to kneel and pray on the sidewalk. He suddenly appeared again at the door, and deliberately threw a pailful of water over the kneeling women. The insult was one that under other circumstances might not have provoked any great degree of indignation. Among the women themselves it did not. They rose quietly enough, and started to go on down the walk to the next saloon. Mrs. Vernon, Mrs. Edwards and Esther had been nearest the door, and had received the greater part of the drenching. They did not appear to be much disturbed by it, and Mrs. Vernon had begun singing another hymn to cheer on the other women, who began to feel a little frightened, when they all noted the rush of men from all sides towards them.

But Douglas and Quits were not the only men in Colby that day who viewed that insult to the women with a white-heated anger. There were dozens of old soldiers there who had known and reverenced Mother Vernon and Mrs. Edwards, as wives of comrades who had ministered to them personally on the field, and by the hospital, and moved in and out of the community in Colby honored and beloved by all the citizens. The sight of one of the most degraded and useless members of society treating these honored women with an insult so plain and unprovoked, stirred every man who saw it with passion. There were two other young married women who had gone with Esther.

Their husbands were clerks in Mr. Edwards' store, and they were standing with Mr. Edwards in the doorway when Lawson threw his pail of water, but young as they were, and stirred with the same indignation that roused Douglas at the sight, they could not out-distance the old soldier, who was as gallant a lover as if he had been married yesterday. He raced up the street like a war horse, and arrived in front of the saloon just as Douglas and Quits, with a dozen others, came up, panting and furious.

Jake Lawson saw the mob coming, and hastily retreated, locking the door just in time to prevent Douglas from pushing it open with his shoulder. Douglas, panting and trembling from his furious run, could hear the saloon-keeper barricading the door with some furniture dragged out of the bar-room. Half a dozen men, with Douglas, had now crowded up against the door, and were battering it with their fists.

"Open up or we'll tear the whole front off your place!" yelled Mr. Edwards, who was one of the men next to Douglas.

"The first man to break in here will get a dose of cold lead," Jake shouted back, as he continued to fortify his position.

"Here, Mr. Edwards," some one yelled. "Here! Smash it in with this."

A heavy plank, torn from an advertising board near by, was thrust forward and a dozen pair of eager hands seized it. Douglas was mad with hate. The older men in the mob had scores to settle with Jake Lawson for various injuries inflicted on children or relatives in his business. And another tragedy might have been added that day to the heavy list already due to the saloon, when a woman's voice was heard above the angry cries of the men. Douglas drew back and his hands let go their hold on the plank. It was Esther who was speaking.

"Stop!" she cried. "Stop. This is not the way to fight the saloon. You will do more harm than good."

"It's what we want to do, right now," yelled a man next to Edwards.

"Frank! Frank!" Esther appealed to him as he stood wedged in among the others who had paused instinctively as Esther's clear strong voice rose, striking in among all the rougher notes like some sweet-toned instrument. "Tell them that it is a mistake. We were not hurt, Mr. Edwards! Tell them to stop! What are a few drops of water! Frank, you know you are doing a thing for which you will have to be sorry. It is not the way."

"Go on!" shouted one of the men behind Mr. Edwards. "Go on! Are we going to have our women insulted by Jake Lawson and do nothing about it? I say let's tear his old shebang down!"

"That's right. Smash in his windows!" some one back on the sidewalk shouted.

"Hold on! Hold on! boys," Mr. Edwards called out in his old style, that more than one man remembered hearing in places when bullets were the main argument. "Mrs. Douglas isn't far wrong. We're doing a thing that won't aid the cause. We're bound to think of that!"

"I don't know that we are," muttered one of the men who had hold of the plank.

"James Edwards!" called out his wife, "You know this won't help any. Smashing Jake Lawson's saloon won't drive him out. He can build another. And you'll have it to pay for. What you men want to do is to vote Jake Lawson out of business. If we women could do it we'd a done it long ago."

Several of the men said, "That's so!" And another man let go of the plank. Mrs. Vernon and several other of the women added their plea to Esther's. She finally succeeded in getting near enough to Douglas to put her hand on his arm.

"Come, Frank," she said, with her old-time smile, that he could never resist. "Come! The little insult to us is nothing. But if you do violence here to-day it will help to defeat what we are giving our lives for. Let Jake Lawson alone. His pail of water will win us more converts than a year's campaign speeches, if you do not strike back."

Douglas bowed his head, and right there, on Jake Lawson's premises, he fought out another fight. Through the Narrow Gate. He knew his wife had wisdom on her side, and he wondered even there at her remarkable self-restraint and foresight. He had occasion more than once during the next five years to thank God for the gift of one of the truest natures as helpmeet in his life, but perhaps never at any time more than this.

He swiftly yielded to her judgment, and as swiftly acted upon it. He raised his arm and shouted:

"Three cheers for the brave women of Colby!"

Mr. Edwards led off with a rousing three times three.

"And I say Mrs. Edwards is right," Douglas went on after a pause that followed. "What can we gain by breaking up Jake Lawson's saloon? I was just as eager for it as any of you a few moments ago, but I am fortunate in having a wife that has more sense. We have everything to gain and nothing to lose by letting the saloon alone. But let's go back to our business and help roll up a stack of votes against the saloon as an institution that will batter it into everlasting oblivion."

"That's right! That's sense!" different ones cried. The women all urged the wisdom of Douglas' remarks. He and Edwards walked away from the door, and the few men who now had hold of the plank hesitated a moment and then threw it down on the walk.

"I'd given a good deal, though," said Edwards with a sigh, "if I could have got hold of Jake Lawson's hide for one minute. I expect God will make him more uncomfortable than I could."

The men began slowly to scatter. The women formed again, and Mrs. Vernon said something about going on to the next saloon.

Mr. Edwards spoke decidedly. "Now then, ladies, you don't go to any more saloons. Not with my consent. Julia, we have listened to your reason as we should. But I say it is simply casting pearls before swine to go praying for these whisky men. Go and have your prayer meeting in the churches. Am I right, Douglas?"

"I don't want Esther to go any more." Douglas answered: "I question the value of it. I believe it's a matter of pearls before swine all right in Jake Lawson's case and probably all the other saloon-keepers. They know well enough they are engaged in a godless business. There isn't one of them who does not know just as well as we that the whole liquor business creates hell on earth. With that full knowledge they deliberately choose to engage in it, because of the enormous profits compared with the brains and ability to run it. I don't object to the women praying for all of these men. They need it. But I do object to their being exposed to needless insult from them."

"And yet, Mr. Douglas, can you blame us women if we feel driven to resort to any and every means in our power to remove this awful evil from our town and State?" asked an elderly woman, whom Douglas recognized as one of the wives in Colby whose husband was steadily becoming a common drunkard. "You men will not permit us women the right of suffrage in State affairs. What is there for us to do but pray and wait?"

The Value of Promptness

One point we wish to emphasize as strongly as we can. As Christmas approaches, the rush of business both in our own office and in the offices of express and transportation companies becomes enormous. It will not only be a convenience, but it will avert disappointment, if you renew your subscriptions and order your premiums now.

You understand, of course, that even if your subscription does not expire until January or February, or any other time of the year, it does not matter. When you send the money for the premium offer, we date your subscription one year ahead of any date on which it may now expire, so that prompt action certainly cannot entail any loss. On the other hand, it will be to your advantage

BANEFUL AMUSEMENTS*

IT is related that during the reign of the bluff King Hal, there lived a knight named Sir John Giffard, of Chillington, who possessed a beautiful leopard. One day the animal escaped from its cage, and Sir John and his son at once gave chase, for they knew that the leopard would spare no human being it might meet. At the top of a hill, a mile from his house, the worthy knight saw the animal about to attack a woman and child. Sir John was armed with a bow and arrow, and rather breathless through running; his son, fearing his shot might be too weak, shouted, "Take aim, draw strong!" Never was surer aim taken, for Sir John pierced the leopard's heart, and saved the woman and her babe. In consideration of this brave and skilful deed, the Giffards of Chillington adopted as their crest a leopard's head and an archer with a bent bow, with the motto, "Take aim, draw strong."

This is what many good and great men have done in regard to some amusements, the influences of which have proved destructive to character. To enjoy one-self is a Divine right, provided such enjoyment does not injure health, weaken morals or lead others to place a false estimate on living.

Amusement is not an end, but a means of refreshing the mind and replenishing the strength of the body, that the work of life may be easier and better done. When it begins to be the principal thing for which one lives, or when in pursuing it, the mental powers are enfeebled, and health impaired, it then falls under just condemnation.

Amusements that consume the hours of the night which were intended for rest and sleep, thus making one nervous, besides increasing one's love for romance and adventure, are wrong. Amusements which call one away from study or duty are pernicious, just to the extent they cause negligence or unfaithfulness. Amusements that rouse or stimulate morbid appetites, suggest wrong things, cause one to be discontented, lead into bad company or expenditure beyond one's means, should always be avoided, for their tendency is downward rather than upward.

Care must be taken in choosing amusements. Those should be chosen which have some advantage beyond merely supplying a pleasant pastime, and those avoided which lead to bad company, drinking, horse racing, gambling, or any place where so many are allured to destruction. Multitudes of boys have gone down morally, socially, financially and spiritually under their blasting influences, never to rise again. There are few amusements so harmless, but what they may be carried into low association and made an instrument of evil, hence every boy should look to himself that no dishonesty, betting or over-exertion be allowed.

Don't play cards. "Is it possible there is harm in cards?" you ask. "Is it wrong to shuffle a few pieces of pictured and spotted papers in the parlor?" No, my boy. But it is the harm which comes from them, with no known excuse to palliate its pernicious consequences. Card-playing has a fascination connected with it. It seems as innocent a game as swinging the mallet on a croquet lawn, but it is as dangerous as a revolver in the hands of a child. It has dealt out death and destruction by the wholesale. "It has made," as Dr. Withrow said, "so many noble lives base, upright people dishonest, rich people poor, poor people painfully impoverished, and altogether it has a dark indictment against it in the court of heaven."

Don't go to the dance. "Why, the Bible itself defends this amusement," is frequently said. "Did not the Hebrews dance when they emerged from the Red Sea? Did not David dance before the ark? Was not Socrates taught it by Aspasia, and was it not held in veneration by Plato and other philosophers?" Yes, but dancing, my boy, was much different in Bible times that it is today. It was because of deliverances from, or a victory over an enemy. No case but one is found in the Bible where promiscuous dancing was indulged in, and that is called "the wicked dance." Ever since the daughter of Herodias danced off the head of John the Baptist, it has degenerated; and as Cicero addressed a grave reproach to Consul Gabinus for having danced, so would the writer sound the danger trumpet with the words, "Beware! Beware!"

When Moscow was burning, the historian tells us, a party was dancing in the palace right over a gunpowder magazine, of which they were ignorant. The flames came on, and Carnot said, "Let us have one dance more," and they shouted all through the palace, "One dance more!" The music played, the feet bounded, the laughter rang. But suddenly, through the smoke and fire and thunder of the explosion, death and eternity broke in. "One dance more" has been the ruin of many a young man, the deathblow of many a good reputation, the cause of many a jealousy which ended in crime, and the murderer of many a virtue which bid fair to distinguish the noble youth.

* From Stepping Stones to Manhood, by Wm. A. Pearce. 352 pages, cloth covers. Price $1.50. Harper & Bros., Philadelphia, publishers.

"Everyman"

VERY quaint, carrying the reader far back into the pre-Reformation times, is the text of Everyman, now issued by Fox, Duffield & Co., of New York. It represents, in allegory, a man who is notified that he must soon die, and he shrinks in terror from the unknown journey he must take beyond the grave. Who will go with him? To whom can he apply for solace and comfort? He thinks of his kindred, but they make excuse. Beauty, Strength, Discretion, etc., all personified, who make so much of his present life, also fail him in the emergency. Good Deeds, which, according to the ideas prevalent in those days, might have helped him, lies weak and powerless, as she has received no sustenance from him for a long time. At last, helped by Knowledge and the hope inspired by religion, as exemplified in Catholic practices, he dies in peace. It is the Pilgrim's Progress of an early age, before the light of the truth preached by Luther and Wycliffe dawned on the world.

BOOKS RECEIVED

The Key of Paradise, by Sidney Pickering. A beautiful Italian story, which holds the reader's interest to the end. 308 pages, cloth. Price $1.50. The Macmillan Company, New York, publishers.

The Young Man Entering Business, by Orison Swett Marden. This latest book by Dr. Marden is one that specially appeals to those who stand upon the threshold of their career—at a point where wise and experienced counsel is most needed, to aid the beginner in choosing the path that leads to honor and success and in avoiding the pitfalls that have tripped up so many of his predecessors. No one—young man or young woman—can read this book without feeling a moral and mental uplift and strengthening in every page. Cloth covers, pp. 379. Price $1.25. Thomas Y. Crowell Co., New York, publishers.

Wisdom vs. Foolishness, by Prof. H. D. Perky, President of the Oread Institute, Worcester, Mass., is a little book which should be welcomed by all who take a personal interest in questions that relate to proper food and general physical health. It might save a great many subsequent regrets, if parents, teachers and young people were to study this little volume, which presents, in popular, condensed form, much valuable practical information as to dieting, care of mouth and teeth and general health. Pp. 100, illustrated. Price 55 cents. Perky Publishing Co., Worcester, Mass., Publishers.

The Golden Fetich, by Eden Phillpotts. A story of the Rider Haggard type, being the narrative of an expedition to Central Africa for a vast hidden treasure. There is plenty of action and exciting adventure and sanguinary encounters with the natives; there is also a mysterious and beautiful white queen, who wears on her forehead a golden fetich or tribal talisman, which has a mysterious power over the savages. But the reader must find out in the book who the lady is and what happens to the hero. The descriptions of African tribal life and customs are exceedingly interesting. Pp. 362, cloth covers. Price $1.50. Dodd, Mead & Co., New York, publishers.

The Marble Faun, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, is No. 1 of the "Unit Book Series," issued by Howard Wilford Bell, 259 Fifth avenue, New York. The "Unit Books" are a monthly issue of the standard literary works of all lands, presented to American readers in the best obtainable English versions. This plan will secure to the readers a collection of the most famous books in the classic field—history, fiction, science, education, etc. All the books are well printed and bound. Under the unit system, the purchaser of these books pays one cent for every twenty-five pages of printed matter. The books are bound in paper, cloth or leather. One hundred titles are now in preparation. Price of The Marble Faun is—paper, 21 cents; cloth, 51 cents; leather, 71 cents. Address H. Wilford Bell, 259 Fifth Avenue, New York.

tolerated. Let the critics weed out, prune and clarify, unsparingly and thoroughly; but let them do it impartially on old and new hymnology alike.

Vineland, N. J. MRS. FRANK A. BELCK.

Jingling Tunes and Doggerel Verse

I am very glad that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is calling public attention to a matter which needs reform. The deterioration in church music concerns every person who desires to have praise the chief element in the song service of a worshiping assembly. Mere jingling tunes and doggerel verse lower the tone of praise and are unworthy the house of God. Undoubtedly there are fine melodies, set to the lilting music that stirs the heart in a camp meeting or a crowded tent, which have their place and power, but the old stately measures, and the noble psalms and hymns that are hallowed by long association, surpass these in their inspirational influence. In the singing of great congregations, what can be finer than, "Balerma," "Dennis," "Dundee," and "Maitland," with the words wedded to these familiar tunes, and not to be rudely separated from them?

My own feeling is that as we raise the standard of taste in church music, we raise also the standard of devotion, and I sympathize with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S crusade in this important field.

New York. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Churches Should Begin the Work

Reform in sacred song has been going on continually. Sometimes it has been in the direction of classic forms of music; at other times in the direction of ballad music; at other times in paths of original styles. The hymn tunes in vogue twenty-five years ago are now seldom used; others have taken their places. What style of music will prevail twenty years hence, it is impossible to predict. Safe to say, its elevation will depend far more upon general musical education than upon any other factor. Hence I believe a church or other organization desiring to improve its hymn music should begin with an effort to elevate the individual taste by musical education.

Philadelphia, Pa. JOHN J. HOOD.

No Tendency Towards Deterioration

I think a great deal of the matter written on this subject has little foundation in fact. I do not believe that there has been any tendency in late years toward deterioration in the quality of music used in church and Sunday School. On the other hand, I contend that the tendency of the times is upward.

New York City. I. H. MEREDITH.

National W. C. T. U. Convention

THE Ninth Street Baptist Church of Cincinnati, O., was appropriately chosen as the meeting place of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union this year. Thirty years ago, after the beginning of the great movement which has now become world-wide, the founders of the W. C. T. U. assembled in this church to perfect their organization. How much work has been done, how eventful the period since that memorable day in 1873!

Five hundred delegates and a large number of visitors were present on November 13, when the President, Mrs L. M. N. Stevens, called the assembly to order. In her opening address, she spoke of the work being done in Germany, France, Russia, Ireland and England. In the last-named country an effort is being made to induce Parliament to abolish barmaids, 80,000 of whom are employed in Great Britain. Mrs. Susanna M. Fry, the Corresponding Secretary, announced the organization of 332 Unions, with 9,547 members. The net gain in membership for the year was 6,954. The treasurer's report showed receipts $26,177, and expenditure $25,399, leaving a balance to be carried forward of $778. Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, speaking for the Purity Department, said that curfew laws were now in force in about three thousand cities. During the year free literature, comprising 275,000 pages, had been distributed.

Sunday was a banner day at the Convention. It demonstrated the Organization's title to the religious qualification in its name. In nearly fifty churches the chief speaker was a member of the W. C. T. U., and the audiences were such as the regular preachers are seldom able to gather. Mrs Katherine Lente Stevenson, of the Massachusetts Union, had the place of honor as preacher at the Convention Church. One of the most interesting debates at the Convention was that on the proposal to add to the pledge against intoxicating liquor, the words "and tobacco in all its forms." Several speakers protested against the addition, on the ground that it would alienate the sympathy of men now working with the Organization who used tobacco. The opposition carried the day, and the proposal was laid on the table. The chief officers of the Union were re-elected.

able and ready to convert the rich soil into practical wealth, if they only knew how. So what is fitly said of Greece that she "does not need more culture, but more agriculture," is in a large sense applicable to Macedonia. Also the frugality of our people is of a high order—a very hopeful sign as to the good use to which they can put the more abundant reward of their labor. Economy is an innate characteristic of the Bulgarian peasant, and when he is taught how to live and how best to employ his income, with a due regard for the Christian doctrine that "the Lord loveth a cheerful giver," he will do his share, and the Lord's work will consequently prosper. We have men and women thoroughly devoted to the Gospel, and naturally fitted for personal work "in season and out of season," provided, of course, that they were safe from the charges of political spies, who are a large and well-organized force in Macedonia. So with some, as liberal contributors of means; and others, as untiring pastors, preachers, evangelists, Bible women, etc., I believe that the present feeble evangelical churches have a great future before them.

That there are now in Macedonia more than 200,000 people who are absolutely without shelter or food, for the coming six months at least, and as many as 25,000 have fled to Bulgaria in utter destitution and distress, all of them depending upon charity and philanthropy for the very sustenance of life and for their clothing, is only another demonstration of the fact that Jesus does not yet "reign where'er the sun does his successive journeys run," and that the cry, "Come over into Macedonia and help us," is about as urgent to us as itwas to St. Paul in the vision.

Our Drop-Leaf Calendar

We have received many letters from subscribers whose subscriptions do not expire until after the beginning of the new year, inquiring how they can get possession of our Butterfly Drop-Leaf Calendar and other premiums, in time to use them for the Christmas holidays. In response to these inquiries, we would say that subscriptions expiring during the year 1904, may be renewed at the present time without any loss to the subscriber, as the date is extended for a full year from the date on which the subscription expires. On receipt of such renewal, we will immediately forward the selected premiums.

PASSED TO PEACE

The late Mrs. Emma Booth-Tucker, Consul of Salvation Army in the United States.

WE wonder why thus she was taken,
A leader so brave in the strife,
So broad was the field of her service,
So grand was her purpose of life.
Though swift from heroic endeavor
She passed to the peace and the rest,
We leave it with Thee, oh our Father,
Well knowing thy way is the best.

Commander and children remaining,
Oh, broken and grief-stricken band,
God help you to lift up the standard
Of righteousness over the land.
That dear, aged father, God bless him!
How brave in his sorrow is he,
We waft him the tenderest greeting
Of Christians this side of the sea,

But what of the poor and the lowly?
Who'll list to their heartrending call
And carry the work like the Consul—
On whom will her bright mantle fall?
Who'll bear them the dear, loving message
And give the warm clasp of the hand,
Who'll tell of a Saviour that's longing
To gather them into his band?

We pray thee, oh Lord of the harvest,
Send another as faithful and true,
With manner as winning, persuasive,
With spirit as eager to do.
Oh grant that the mind of our sister,
The spirit her life-work has shown,
Live on in the hearts of her comrades,
Her life be lived out in their own.

M. B. W.

THE SAVING POWER *

Man Excluded by His Sin from Participation in Christ's Redemption

THE crowning glory of Christ, that renders him so dear to the world, is the love he bears to the wrecks of humanity. Good men, like Nicodemus and Nathanael and Paul, whose lives were without reproach, were attracted to him and loved him; but it was the sinful Mary, the despised Zaccheus and the poor lost souls of his time, that brought to him the passionate adoration of their hearts. He, to whom much is forgiven, loveth much. There is something very wonderful in the fact that One so pure and holy, should voluntarily seek out the first among men for his ministry. To be sure, it is they who are most in need, but the general tendency is to pass them by, as contemptible, and expend effort on those who are good but may be made better. Christ was reproached for association with sinners, but his reply was typical. It was sinners whom he came to call. As a famous preacher says, "he was attending to his business." To the ordinary man the sight of a horrible ulcer is repulsive, but the physician looks at it with interest. It is to him a beautiful case. Why? Because he is going to cure it. He will begin at Jerusalem," he said to his disciples at the last. That was the city in which were the men who had cried "Crucify him." The worst crime ever committed was perpetrated there. That was the place to begin the redeeming process. What comfort that brings to sinful men! When a man is sunk so low in his own esteem that he despairs of ever being other than a complete moral wreck, he is eligible as a patient for Christ. The very worst man on earth, whose life is so very much worse than any one knows, whose conscience tells him how unspeakably vile he is, has only to put himself in Christ's hands, and he will be delivered. He has only to approach Christ with a confession of his guilt, and a sincere desire to be saved, and Christ will save him. Take a man in prison for a capital offense, who is also suffering from a loathsome disease, he goes to Christ and receives pardon for his past crime, and healing for his corrupt nature. The only requisite is an intense, heartfelt wish to be healed. All else Christ supplies. Repentance, faith, holiness, all come under his treatment. To honestly seek salvation, and to believe that it can be had in Christ, is the beginning of all blessing.

WORRY ELIMINATED †

With the Antidote of Present Distress and Apprehension about the Future

PEACE of mind is a blessing which to the vast majority of the world is the most desirable of all that could be bestowed. So few of us have the lot we would wish, so few have the assurance of our desires for the future being fulfilled, that it seems almost impossible to avoid worry. This and the other calamities are impending; if the blow falls, how will we bear it? Even men of wealth, who are the envy of the multitude, are not as they from peace. They know that crises may come, that sickness may come, that death certainly will, and then they must bear their burden like other men. Even with people who have overcome the propensity to meet future troubles and to bear them in anticipation, there are the worries of daily life. In blunder, we fall into sin, we are disgusted by the wrongdoing of those we love, we meet with losses, vexations, and disappointments. It is a worrying life for the great majority. Toil and trouble rest on our every hour. Into all this nothing disturbance comes the calm, inviting voice from on high, "Let not your heart be troubled . . . believe in me." Our faith has richer comforts to give than many of us have ever laid hold of. If we fully believed, as we profess to believe, worry would disappear out of our lives. If we believe that our whole lives are in the hands of One who loves us and is concerned for our welfare, is to have a weapon that should slay all worry. Does trouble come? We may bear it manfully if we are sure it is not an accident, but a discipline. It may be that the side of our character which this particular trouble calls into exercise, needs to be developed. Does some catastrophe seem to be impending? The God who has supported us hitherto, can give the strength we shall need to bear it, if it does fall upon us. We know we shall never be left alone, but that always, even in the valley of the shadow of death, the hand that has led us on will still be with us. In the dark unknown, whither we all go, we shall have the companionship of Him who liveth and was dead and is now alive for evermore. Into his hand we may commit all our cares and apprehensions.

FIFTY-CENT UNDERWEAR.

The Low Cost and Superior Quality of Utica Ribbed Fleece Startles the Knitting World.

Thousands of people who lead outdoor lives, and whose occupations expose them to extremes of heat and cold, are giving a cordial welcome to the new kind of underwear that is having such a tremendous sale in the stores this winter. It is called Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear.

Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear is an exact description of this product of the Utica Knitting Company. The foundation of the garment is an elastic rib into which the fleece is knitted. The fleece, which will not mat nor rumple, maintains comfort and equable warmth. The elasticity, which it never loses, makes the garment follow every curve of the form.

This elastic quality of Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear also affords ventilation, prevents shrinking, and enables it to go through the wash with shape and size unchanged.

These features make the fabric very serviceable for women's garments. Now bending over a hot stove, now in the cold yard or cellar, few are more exposed to changes of temperature than the busy housewife. It is safe to say that no underwear has ever been devised that is better adapted to the needs of women who are subject to such exposure.

Women's garments are well cut, tastefully trimmed, close-fitting and of full length. Men's garments are a revelation in comfort to men who wear them for the first time. Both are sold at fifty cents a garment.

Children's vests and pants and union suits are extra strong in the seams and joints, and very serviceable. Price twenty-five cents a separate garment, union suits fifty cents.

Utica Ribbed Fleece, the trademark, is sewed on every garment.

God in His Temple

A Type of the Indwelling Spirit

By Mrs. M. Baxter

SOLOMON was to be in his life a foreshadowing of Him who, coming as the lineal descendant of David, should sit upon David's throne (Luke 2: 32), and reign in righteousness as Prophet, Priest, and King. He carried out the pattern of all that God had showed David of his will concerning the building and furnishing of the temple, which will again be rebuilt, and in which Christ, as King-priest will be worshiped in the millennium. After all was finished, Solomon "assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel"—of course, twelve in number—"that they might bring up the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, which is Zion." It was the time of the feast of tabernacles. And all the men of Israel assembled themselves unto king Solomon.

From this time the tabernacle, so long disused, except when Solomon had offered a thousand burnt-offerings at the door of it, on the brazen altar (II. Chron. 1: 6) was to be replaced by the newly-built temple. The king and the people were before the ark, sacrificing sheep and oxen, which could not be told nor numbered for multitude. It was an expression of loyal homage to Him whom they worshiped: it meant a full surrender of all to Him. How easy this seems when everyone is doing the same thing! How different when we stand entirely alone, when no one is near to encourage, and we realize our utter powerlessness! And yet this is just the time when God prizes the surrender, and signs his name to it, and sets his seal upon it. Abraham's response, when God called him out from country, house, and kindred, was very precious in the eyes of God—"I called Abraham alone,"—and also his response when called upon to offer up the son of promise. The man of faith stood alone on both occasions, the worthy pattern of all them that believe.

The ark contained only the tables of stone; "the testimony." The rod of Aaron which budded, and the pot of manna, were there no longer: probably the Philistine must have taken them. But the presence of the God-written law is most significant. It was the very innermost thing in the whole temple, the very ark over which the glory of the Lord came, contained the Word of God within it, and it was the innermost point of the most holy place. How vain, then, is it to build gorgeous and beautiful buildings, ostensibly to worship God, where the very means he has provided for our real contact and communion with him is given a second place, and music, vestments, ceremonial, incense, and such things are given pre-eminence over the Word of God!

The same pillar of cloud which had led their forefathers through the wilderness, was now visibly returned to dwell in their midst. No wonder the priests could not minister. The presence of the Lord brings intense silence and awe into a heart which is bowed down before him: we have but to think of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, the apostle John, to know how such a presence brings all which is of man down to the earth in silent worship before him. "The Lord is in his holy temple; be silent all the earth before him" (Hab. 2: 20). The Lord had drawn near and had taken possession. What a moment!

And now Solomon, who was unconsciously a type of the greater than Solomon, takes the place of priest. He does not call the high priest to come and bless the people; "the king turned his face about," which had been towards the glory of the Lord, and blessed all the congregation of Israel," and then addressed them in few words (I Kings 8, 14-21). And then he stood before the altar of the Lord in the temple court, in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands towards heaven, and the king prayed a prayer of intercession for his people—again as a type of Christ our Intercessor. After his intercession, Solomon a second time blessed the people, and for eight days held a feast to the Lord. Solomon was in the zenith of his power and glory at this time. While the temple was building he was fully occupied, and all his heart and soul were in the work which God had given him to do.

More New Sayings of Christ Found

BIBLICAL scholars eagerly await the arrival of the full text of the papyrus, recently discovered in a mound El-Hibeh, Egypt, the description of hich comes by cable from London. The scoverers are Drs. Grenfell and Hunt, ho, in 1897, found in a mound at Oxyrncus, the papyri containing eight sayngs attributed to Christ, three of which ere not given in any of our Gospels. he papyrus now found is not in so good condition as the former, the ends of the nes being obliterated. It purports to be memorandum of sayings addressed by r Lord to Thomas and another disci-e. As in the other papyri, each saying gins with the words, "Jesus saith."

In the somewhat confused cable reort, four sayings are mentioned as being the papyrus. Whether there are more doubtful. One of these is evidently e same as that in Luke 11 : 52, which in r version reads: "Woe unto you lawers! for ye have taken away the key of owledge; ye entered not in yourselves d them that were entering in ye hinered." On the new papyrus it reads: 'e have hidden the key of knowledge; entered not in yourselves and to them at were entering in ye did not open." nother of the sayings contains the words und in Luke 17 : 21, "The kingdom of od is within you." According to our ospel they were uttered in reply to the harisees, who asked when the kingdom God should come. In the new papys the same words are used, but in reply a question of the disciples who asked, How shall we fast? How shall we pray? ow shall we give alms?" A third saying entirely new, though something similar s contained in an apocryphal Gospel, own as "The Gospel according to the ebrews." It reads, "Let not him that seekn cease from his search until he find; and hen he finds, he shall wonder; wondering shall reach the kingdom; and when he aches the kingdom he shall have rest." nother version of this saying is, "He that anders shall reign, and he that reigns shall st." The fourth saying is enigmatical, d perhaps is one of those, part of which obliterated. According to the cable reort, it is an answer to the question of when Christ's kingdom would be realized. The actual words of the saying are not given, but they are said to resemble an expression found in another apocryphal Gospel, which is known as the Gospel according to the Egyptians. In that Gospel the reply is given as: "When ye shall trample on the garment of shame; when the two shall be one and the male as the female, neither male nor female." The terms of this saying were understood to refer to the putting off the body at death; but the words used in the new papyrus appear to indicate a reference to the state of innocence existing before the Fall.

From the character of these sayings, as of those previously found, it would appear that the words are not an authoritative utterance. They read as if they were a memorandum, made by some one who had listened to an address by Thomas or some other Apostle, and had made notes.

The papyrus on which the sayings were inscribed was found in a mound at El-Hibeh, about one hundred miles south of Cairo. The mound, like that at Oxyrhyncus, in which the former papyri were found, contained a quantity of other literature, all believed to have been written before the year 300 A.D. The documents were of classical and theological character. The mounds were examined to a level with the surrounding country, and every document was carefully removed. The explorers did not dig lower, because they were convinced that even if papyri were found, the writing upon them would be illegible, because of the damp.

It is marvelous that the writing on those already found should be legible after nearly seventeen hundred years. Even in a climate so dry as that of Egypt, one would have expected the ink to fade in so long a period. It is surprising, too, that the papyrus has not decayed. It is not now certain how it was made. The general impression gathered from an account of Pliny, is that it consisted of strips cut from the stem of the papyrus plant, which were placed side by side and bound together. These were soaked in water from the Nile and dried in the sun. A smooth surface was obtained by rubbing it with an ivory knife or a shell.

REFUGEES COMING DOWN FROM THE MOUNTAINS ON THEIR WAY TO JANINA

200,000 COLD, HOMELESS AND STARVING

Macedonia's Black Christmas

MISS ELLEN STONE APPEALS for the REFUGEES

NEVER was so sad a Christmas-tide known in Macedonia as the present, which will pass into history as the "Black Christmas." Among the bleak hills, now fast whitening with snow, and in the burned and blackened valleys, there are thousands of refugees still fighting a desperate battle—not now with Turks and bashi-bazouks, but with starvation. Two hundred thousand homeless Christian men, women, and children, and winter at hand! Such is the theme of the appeal from the pen of Miss Ellen M. Stone, which we print below, and in which she pleads with the Christians of America, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to unite in an effort to save the Macedonians. This is her appeal, and we commend it to our readers, and to all who have in their hearts the love of Christ, and sympathy for human suffering:

"Although the daily dispatches of encounters between Turkish troops, or bashi-bazouks, with insurgent bands, and of the subsequent sacking of Christian villages and towns, with all its attendant horrors, have become more infrequent of late, the agonized cry from Macedonia still continues, and must be heard.

"It is the cry from the twenty-five thousand refugees who have contrived to make their escape over the mountains, into free Bulgaria. They have found sympathizing hearts in their fellow-countrymen there, whose twenty-five years of freedom has not yet effaced the memories of their own affliction and their misery, before freedom was won for them. Here men and women of all ranks of society have welcomed them, with tears for their heartrending suffering, and destitution, and efforts for their relief. From Prince Ferdinand upon his throne, with his private gift of thousands of francs, and his five-year old daughter, the Princess Evdokia, who is patroness of the children's ward in the Alexander Hospital at Sophia, with her gift of hundreds of francs, through all branches of the government, national and municipal, and circles of society, the same deep thrill of truest sympathy is felt. Various associations and clubs are raising funds by giving entertainments, the proceeds of which swell relief funds. From Slavic Bohemia comes help, while Mrs. Baklymetieff, the American wife of Russia's diplomatic agent at Sophia, continues her noble work, begun fully a year ago, of dispensing aid, largely from Russian sources, to the terror-stricken refugees. Nor does she keep back her own property, as a recent gift of five thousand dollars from her proves.

"During these latest months, the exigencies of relief work have become so imperative that the American missionaries have added to their ever abounding service this one also, of receiving funds sent them from Britain, America, or elsewhere in the world, that they and their native co-workers may turn to account their thorough knowledge of the country and its people—to help diminish the terrible suffering

"Most pathetic is it to see that even those pitifully suffering ones at all times—the professional beggars—in mute token of their sympathy, and desire to help these newly impoverished ones, give the foremost places in the line of suppliants at the church-doors after every service, to these, while they take places lower down in the line, and, consequently, take the diminished chance of any para remaining in any charitable hand, for their own desperate needs. God grant that we Christians in prosperous America be not put to shame by the practical sympathy and helpfulness of even the beggars of Bulgaria!

"But if twenty-five thousand refugees have made their way to safe, because free, Bulgaria, what shall be said of the two hundred thousand and more who remain in Macedonia? Their condition beggars description. British correspondents, consular reports, and private advices agree in their statements of little children found dead, while the grass and buds of bark still to their mouths told the terrible story of their starvation, sometimes in the mountains with their mothers, who had fled with them from their burning homes. These same sources tell us of multitudes of starving children who flee not to whom an Englishman can give a piece of bread, a month since. He was amazed to see the famished people as it is here burnt and grass is not killing for even hours, but as an animal might have devoured a corpse. And this is true in these days, to a portion of Europe close to more centres of wealth and luxury than grandparent, also; and the Almighty only knows not a single family is there that has not had to interpret these cries of starving infants, which no mother can understand these sufferings [illegible]

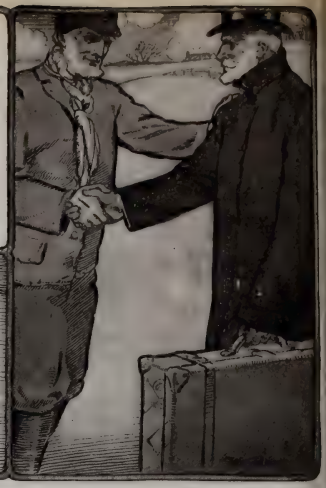
CHRISTMAS RECONCILIATIONS

A Sermon by Rev. Frank De Witt Talmage, D.D.

TEXT—Luke 2: 14: "On earth peace, good-will toward men"



CHRISTMAS Day has the Manger for its gem, with the Home for a setting. From time immemorial the commemoration of the birth of Christ has had its true and real celebration, not so much in public festivity and church ceremonial, as in the family gathering around the domestic fireside. Other customs may change; new movements may transform our social life, but the Christmas family gathering maintains its hold on society. The other day a convict was liberated from Sing Sing Penitentiary. He had been imprisoned there for nearly thirty years. He was pardoned, a white-haired old man of sixty-four years. He went in a strong-limbed young man of thirty-five. Up to 1903, he had never ridden on an electric car; he had never seen the wonderful development of the telephone; he had never seen an automobile, or the marvelous development of doing business through the typewriter. He said that he was coming into a strange and a new world—not the world he left, but another he had never seen. But though many customs may change within a quarter of a century, the customs of Christmas Day neither change in a generation, nor a century. Christmas Day always has been, and we hope always will be, a family day. It is well that at least once a year the children and the grandchildren, the brothers and the sisters, and the nephews and the nieces, as well as the fathers and mothers and grandparents, should be gathered within the four walls of the old homestead, and it is appropriate that the season for such reunions should be that at which we celebrate the advent of our Lord.

Family Skeletons

But though God "setteth the solitary in families"; though on Christmas Day, above all other days, he would have us worship him in communion with our kith and kin; though we should delight to prove that blood is thicker than water; yet the startling fact remains uncontroverted, that the grinning skeleton, which rattles its bones and clatters its teeth almost every Christmas Eve, in almost every family closet, is the hideous skeleton of domestic strife. By this statement we do not mean that the father and mother, and the little children living within the four walls of a house are necessarily unhappy, or that most homes are not peaceful and loving. We do mean, however, that the family name, taken in its larger relation, is not always a loving and harmonious name. We do mean by this statement, that after the father and mother have been carried out to their last resting place, to sleep the sleep of death under a coverlid of snow, estrangements often arise between the married children. We do mean that all over the United States, brothers can be found at variance with brothers, sisters with sisters, and cousins with cousins.

This nation is struck through and through with family strife. The Appalachian Mountains, where Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia and West Virginia meet, have aptly been called "the Land of the Feud." There families have battled with each other for generations. There the wounded John Philipotts shot dead the four Griffins, and he himself was found lying unconscious among his slain. But though the Appalachians can be called "the Land of the Feud," the whole United States can truthfully be termed, "the Land of Family Strife." If I were to enter your family homes and learn the inner secrets of those homes, in all probability there would be found not one family which, among its larger connections, is not cursed with internal strife.

Christmas day is essentially a family day. Would it not be possible, in the weeks before its dawn, for you to arrange your family differences, so that on that day the old quarrel may be settled, and all the hard thoughts and hard words it has engendered may be forgiven and forgotten? I would suggest to you to-day, some reasons why such reconciliation may be and should be effected. I would try, in the name of Jesus Christ, to have over the Manger, brother clasp hands with brother, sister with sister, parent with child, and child with parent. I would try to do this because when the Christmas bells are ringing their carol, no man, no woman, can so truly honor the New Born Child, called the Christ, as by doing his or her part to fulfil the angel message of, "Peace on earth and good-will toward men."

Paternal and Filial Faults

Family dissensions should cease, and immediately cease. Why? They have nearly all, aye practically all, been caused by faults committed on both sides. They have been caused by the pot calling the kettle black, the kettle retaliating by calling the pot black. And at the same time, both are so blinded by the hot fires of domestic dissensions that they cannot see that each is black. It may not be clear who started the family trouble. It is enough to show that if both parties had not erred, there would not have been continued domestic disturbance.

Take, for illustration, the trouble between a father and his son. Every little while, we hear of the son of some prominent man being at variance with his father. An inkling of the trouble may get into the newspaper, or be gossiped about the neighborhood. Some of us side with the parent. We say, "No matter what the father may have done, the son has no right to turn his back upon his sire. On the other hand, some of us side with the son instead of the father. We say that some fathers are mean and selfish, and grasping. They never want to give their sons their rights. It is told of old Emperor William I. of Germany, that when the court artist painted a picture of the German court, with Crown Prince Frederick's foot upon the lowest step of the throne, King William called the artist to him and said, "Take that boy's foot off that throne step. As long as I am king, I want to have the throne for myself." But, in all probability, if you can get to the inside facts of that quarrel between the father and the son, they can all be traced to a disposition in the father which has been inherited by the son. The father may have been a high-strung, impetuous man. The son may have inherited the same fiery disposition. It is a scientific fact that opposites conjoin, not similarities. The positive and the negative poles work together in harmony, not the electric wires carrying the same current. The reason the wife is able to live harmoniously with the husband is that her nature is entirely different from his, and is its natural complement. The father and the son were continually irritating each other. One night there was a domestic explosion. The father ordered the son from the house. The boy never came back. He went to live in another city. He plunged into a life of dissipation. The father blamed the son. The son blamed the father. But are there not grievous faults on both sides?

Contributory Negligence

Take, for illustration, that difficulty which exists between the daughter and her parents. There are faults there just the same. Faults are on both sides. The daughter may have grown up to be the pride of the parental heart. She was the idol of her father and mother. They sent her to school, and gave her every educational advantage that money could procure; but while they were giving money, and, seemingly, every advantage, those parents were not careful about the acquaintances their daughter was forming. The result of this parental negligence was, that the daughter formed an affection for a young man who was not regarded favorably by the parents. They did everything in their power to prevent the marriage; but the trouble was that the parents awoke to the danger too late. The young girl was obstinate; she married against their will. After the daughter left home, she felt that her husband and children were not wanted back in the place where the wife and mother was born, therefore she does not visit where they are not welcomed. The parents, in an unguarded moment, may have said that all their children wanted of them was their money. The daughter is poor, but very proud. How much happiness it would give on all hands if a reconciliation could be effected, and, if the parents, remembering that their negligence contributed to the trouble, and, the daughter, remembering that hard words, spoken in a moment of irritation, should not weigh against long years of love and parental kindness, should come together again and agree to forget the faults on both sides!

Brothers at Variance

What is true of the difficulties between parents and children, is also true of the difficulties between brothers and brothers, sisters and sisters. Inevitably faults are to be found on both sides. Therefore, what is the practical conclusion of all this trend of thought? You, O man, and you, O woman, have no right to complain about the injustices which others have done against you, unless you, at the same time, have done all in your power to atone for the sins which you have, intentionally or unintentionally, done against your brother! If you will go and honestly ask your brother to forgive you the wrong you have done him, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, that brother will ask you to forgive the injustices he has done you. Then, as you both are ready to atone for the evils you have done each other, there will be no further cause for domestic strife. Try to smother the flames of family trouble, by asking your brother to forgive you the wrongs you have done him. Try it, my friend. Try it. Try it before the coming Christmas festivities.

Family dissensions should cease, and immediately cease. Why? Because nearly all family troubles are caused by one member of a family misjudging the motives and position of other members of the family. Because it is almost impossible for people in one sphere of life to properly appreciate the difficulties, and the trials, and the worries, and the disappointments, and the heartaches which are continually nagging and sapping the lives of people in other spheres of life. Because every pair of family glasses, as a rule, has a different lens, and a different focus.

Sources of Misunderstanding

Just study for a moment the different ways the country brother and the city brother look at the matter of family expenses. They can rarely appreciate one another's positions. The brother living in the country hears that his city brother has a yearly income of $5,000. He wants to borrow a few hundred dollars to help stock the farm. The city brother may write back that he cannot afford to lend any money. The country brother cannot believe that a relative having $5,000 income could not lend him a few paltry hundred dollars. But the city brother, who receives a salary of $5,000, may be having just as hard a time to make ends meet as his country brother. Sometime ago, I asked a brother minister of a large city church how he liked his present field. "Well," he said, "of course I ought to be happy on account of its opportunities for usefulness, but to tell the truth, I liked my country field far better, and I think I had there a larger net income. My present church gives me $5,000 a year. With it I have to live in a fine house, dress well, and have my family dress well. When the year rolls around I have practically nothing. But in the country, though I had only a small salary, I also had very small expenses. Besides, I had my garden, my horse and carriage, my cow and chickens. I had fun with them all, and at the end of the year I was able to save $300. I tell you, the country minister thinks the city minister is rich; but the city minister knows the country minister is rich." The man in one sphere of life can rarely appreciate the financial conditions of one in another sphere of life.

Study the misunderstandings between the professional man and his sister, who is living a quiet domestic life. Such a lady says, "My brother never answers my letters now, as he used to do. He never shows me those little courtesies of love I have a right to expect. The last time I wrote him he sent me back a very sharp reply." Yes, my sister, perhaps that is all true. But the reason you are angry with your brother is, you, as a domestic woman, cannot understand the nervous exhaustion under which your professional brother is struggling. Perhaps the reason he does not answer his sister's letters as he used to do is because he is a clergyman, a lawyer, or a newspaper man. Day after day he sits and writes, and writes, and writes. The pen is always in his hand, until the very sight of ink and paper has for him a repulsion. Perhaps the reason the brother does not visit the sister, is because he has been unable to take a vacation for the last ten years. Your difficulties with your brother are chiefly, my sister, because you cannot put yourself in his place.

Every Man Burdened

Oh, that this coming Christmas, we would one and all try to focus our eyes to our brother's spectacles! Then a great many of the family troubles would forever vanish from our darkened horizons. The man who travels about this planet with such a Christian spirit and goes from house to house—from the palace of the rich to the hovel of the poor, from the sumptuous private office of the merchant prince to the counters of the small-salaried clerk—soon discovers that this world is not altogether a mean world, a selfish world, a heartless world, but it is a tired world, a discouraged world, a misunderstood world. If every member of a family who has bitter troubles and trials could realize that his brothers and sisters along the great highways of life are struggling under burdens quite as heavy as his own—although their burdens may be made up in different kinds of packs and have silken cords around them instead of hempen rope—he would be more patient in his criticism of others, as he may hope that others will judge him more charitably. Most of the seeming insults by relatives to relatives are entirely unintentional. As every man hopes for mercy and pardon in the day of Judgment, so there should be forgiveness for one who offends another through inadvertence and not through intention. The fancied injustices between relatives exist for the most part in the distorted imaginations of those who have no right to indulge in unchristian and merciless judgments of relatives who really want to be friends.

Family dissensions should cease, and immediately cease. Why? Because Christmas opportunities of future family reconciliations may be very few. They may never come again. We are intensely shocked at the sudden departures of our great men and women. When Mrs. Emma Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army, was killed on October 29, in a railroad accident, the news was telegraphed from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We commented upon the beautiful coffin plate which we saw, and read thus: "Born June 8, 1860, Consul Emma Booth Tucker; Promoted to glory, October 28, 1903." We were intensely shocked when King Humbert was shot, and when President Carnot was assassinated with a knife thrust. But why should we be so shocked at the sudden death of this man or that, as with the tremendous emigration of a vast host each year from earth into the realm beyond the grave? This is not a platitude, a purposeless saying. It is a statement which ought to be pregnant with the most tremendous import to us all. Can any here, be sure that before another Christmas rolls around, the Death Angel's wing will not have fluttered over our beds?

O my friends, if we are ever going to have Christmas reconciliations, we had better have them now. Human life at the longest is short. When children have grown and scattered, how soon they die! A family may exist intact for ten, twenty, thirty years, but after the Death Angel calls one child, he is very apt to come back soon for another and another, until all are gone. When the family plot is once selected, and a couple of graves dug therein, the hearse gets into the habit of traveling in the same direction, and the black horses to stopping at the same gate: then the sad truth is, that when death does come, regrets may be piled in flowers mountains high upon the casket; brothers may weep over the dead brother; the hands may be pressed and the lips pressed, and the forehead stroked, but the dead will hear not one word. O regrets, regrets! How often have we wept our regrets over the coffin-lids! How often that word might have been chiseled as epitaph upon the tombstone of the dead! Regrets, bitter, heartrending, but useless regrets! Regrets, burning regrets in reference to our kith and kin who are gone.

Win the Children

Family dissensions should cease. Dare any one, old or young, gainsay this immanent truth? But if this warning comes with mighty force to brothers and sisters, how much more should it come to the fathers and mothers who are angry or indifferent with their children? Many people are apt to judge the children harshly when domestic troubles arise between parents and their offspring. But as men and women grow older and have children of their own, they are more willing to blame the parent for the estrangement than they are to blame the child. Have you, parents, ever tried to win back the affections of your children? Did you ever try to recall that cruel remark you once made to your obstinate boy? Have you, oh parent, since that second marriage, which so trampled upon the love of your children, gone regularly to visit your children, as you used to do before their mother's death? Do you send to them the warm, cordial invitations to come home, and insist that they come with their families? Do you, the parents, try to instil into your children the thought that their father and their mother are absolutely equivalent for enjoyment upon their hearthstone and [illegible]

Parents, or one of you, [illegible] ing your children [illegible] about they have [illegible] ought to [illegible] ought to be unfeignedly [illegible] relationships are restored? Oughn't you take this [illegible] the very [illegible] who have been [illegible] who have not been a member of the church more than five years? Ought not the father and the mother to go [illegible] children, [illegible] those children were only so [illegible] the prayer you have been [illegible] at your mother's knee? [illegible] we forgive those that [illegible] means "Pardon us, O God, as we are willing to forgive our debtors."

An End of Opportunity

Cannot the parents who are estranged from their children, realize that the years are few in which it is possible for them to have Christmas reconciliations? When a child receives a parent dying at least the child must realize the most awful agonies that can ever come to a human being this side of the grave. Fear, forlornness, forgive, and be forgiven are the words that earth pleases, good will toward men. Before the next Christmas comes around it will be impossible for some to forgive or to be forgiven. The [illegible] maker is even now manufacturing a coffin. The grave-digger is even now sharpening his pick and spade. The undertaker is even now ready to toll a knell. Brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers, kith and kin, step and stone, your reconciliations to the notes of the Christmas song.

Christmas days have not always heard the angels sing the song, "On earth peace, good will to men." In 1066, William the Conqueror, to complete the triumph over England, decreed that all the country should be devastated between York and Durham. In all that region every city, town, or village was razed to the ground, and so literally was the order executed that a famine ensued in which countless men, women and children perished. So many Christmases since must have witnessed their slaughters of thousands upon thousands. Not the slaughter of life alone, but the slaughter of heart loves, and heart affections between brothers and sisters and parents and children. May the Christmas of 1903 not be a Christmas of domestic tragedy, but of family reunions. May it be the time when the very angels in heaven shall again be compelled to sing for joy that all relatives at the Manger have become reconciled.

THE PRESIDENT'S CHRISTMAS TURKEY

PRESIDENT Theodore Roosevelt will this Christmas receive, as one of his holiday gifts, the thirtieth turkey which has been presented to successive Presidents on similar occasions by one man. Every Yule-tide season finds a number of persons in all parts of the country contributing to the Christmas feast at the White House. Frequently there are donations of cranberries from CapeCod and New Jersey; oysters from Chesapeake Bay; and delicacies from many a nook and corner of Uncle Sam's domain. Among the good things sent to the Chief Magistrate for the Christmas repast there are invariably a number of turkeys. Among the fowls that come to the White House kitchen at Christmas time, one bird invariably enjoys especial prominence. This is sent by Horace Vose of Rhode Island. Mr. Vose's turkey is entitled to special distinction because it is usually the largest of the feathered array. Mr. Vose has been making these donations for nearly a third of a century, and the cooks in the President's kitchen await the arrival of the pet prize of his flock with confidence that they will not be disappointed.

Mr. Vose is now over sixty years of age. He is not a farmer, nor yet a poultry dealer, yet he is known in his own State as the "Turkey King." He controls the turkey industry in a fifteen-mile section of his State. Acting as a middleman, he buys up all the fowls raised by the poultry raisers, and ships them to market, principally in New York, Boston and other large cities. For weeks and months before Christmas, as he rides up and down the turkey-raising belt, he keeps a sharp look-out for promising gobblers who are likely to later become candidates for the place of honor on the President's dinner table. It was during President's Grant's administration that Mr. Vose hit upon the idea of sending a turkey to his neighbor in the White House in Washington. He selected a thirty-six pound bird and shipped it. Soon there arrived at the post-office at Westerly, R. I., a letter, telling how much President Grant enjoyed that big turkey. Mr. Vose has been getting similar notes at the close of every year for thirty years past. Sometimes after a Presidential election he has sent a turkey to the defeated candidate, as well as to the President elect.

MR. VOSE AND THE PRESIDENTIAL TURKEY

The President's turkey is cooked in the heated range of the White House kitchen. It is roasted on the bone for from twelve to fifteen minutes to the pound. The dressing ingredients are a quart [illegible] softened very fine, two cupfuls of fine bread crumbs, a tablespoonful of chopped herbs [illegible] thyme or sweet marjoram—and a sparing amount of salt and pepper.

THE HAPPY HOME

(See colored illustration on cover page)

O HAPPY house! whose little ones are given
Early to Thee, in faith and prayer,—
To Thee, their Friend, who from the heights of heaven
Guards them with more than mother's care.
O happy house! where little voices
Their Christmas anthems love to raise,
And childhood's infant tongue rejoices
To bring new songs of love and praise.

O happy house! and happy servitude!
Where all alike one Master own;
Where daily duty, in Thy strength pursued,
Is never hard nor toilsome known;
O happy house! where Thou art not forgot
When joy is flowing full and free;
O happy house! where every wound is brought,
Our Christ and Comforter, to Thee.

keenness, which is impossible to those who have never known such horrors.

"They can also plead, importunately, with the nation which ransomed them by its prayers and by its money, to be lavish, also, at this blessed Thanksgiving time, with its gifts of prayers and money, to lighten the unspeakable burdens under which groan to-day our Christian neighbors—men, women and children, in modern Macedonia.

"The snows of winter already cover those lofty mountain peaks, and have concealed the berries and leaves upon which the starving refugees were striving to subsist. Shelters must be provided for them somehow, and they be gathered, where at least a small quantity of flour may be doled out to them, and a blanket to help them endure these wintry nights, if their lives are to be preserved. No wonder that the pitying hearts of the relief distributors long for great stores of army blankets, and for thousands and thousands of dollars, to purchase supplies of food and clothing. Let us hasten with our gifts, through the willing channel of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, or of the banking firm of Kidder, Peabody & Co., 115 Devonshire street, Boston, that our Christmas song shall be made even more full of rejoicing than usual, because 'the blessing of Him that was ready to perish,' has fallen upon us.

"We give to the poor at our own doors, through our churches and charitable societies and the Salvation Army. We do well. But, surely, we shall not refuse the bread and 'cup of cold water,' in our Master's name, to those whose piteous cry of need will not leave us at our ease.

'Pity them, pity them, Christians at home,
Haste with the bread of life, hasten, and come!

ELLEN M. STONE."

Chelsea, Mass., NOV. 21, 1903.

Members of a Committee of Native Pastors also Appeal to Christian America.

THE following appeal has been sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, by the Revs. D. N. Furnajieff and M. N. Popoff, members of a Committee of Macedonian pastors, who are now in this country, having come here to awaken public interest in the relief movement:

The civilized world has been shocked by the awful crimes and cruelties perpetrated upon innocent women and children, and old men in Macedonia, during the past summer. Whatever we may say of the revolutionary movement in that most unfortunate land, there is no question that the outrages of the Turks in suppressing it by burning villages, ravishing women and slaughtering old men and children—outrages which surpass description and belief, are a sad blot upon the European civilization.

In consequence of the insurgent activity which the Turkish army of two hundred and fifty thousand could not suppress, the soldiers and bashi-bazouks attacked the towns and villages to revenge themselves on the innocent and defenseless population. So that about one hundred and fifty villages have been pillaged and destroyed, some sixty thousand persons have been killed, two hundred and fifty thousand, having fled to the mountains for their lives, are left shelterless and with no provision for the winter, while not less than twenty-five thousand have fled over to Bulgaria, in almost utter dependence upon charity for the very maintenance of their lives. The need, therefore, for relief is most imperative. Not only must the hungry be fed, the naked clothed, the homeless ones sheltered and warmed, but means must be provided for these Christian people to enable them to begin life over again. The demand for relief, in contrast with the native lack of means for supplying it is most appalling.

REFUGEES WHO HAVE JUST CROSSED INTO BULGARIA

Macedonia, which called Paul to come over with the Gospel of salvation, peace, and progress, has been in the past the means of blessings upon all the Western world, and now she stretches forth her hands to all the Christians and philanthropists to whom God has given more of the earthly blessings of life, to come over and help her in these times of dire distress.

America has always responded very liberally to similar calls, and we, the undersigned natives of Macedonia, do earnestly hope that with the approaching Christmas joys and festivities, Christian people will remember generously these Macedonian sufferers, on whose behalf we have come to plead for aid. A HOME FOR FOUR-FOOTED WAIFS

THE "BIDE-A-WEE HOME" AND ITS HUMANITARIAN WORK AMONG THE DOMESTIC ANIMALS

WHEN we see our home pet animals, comfortable and cosy, lying on the rug, before a cheerful, glowing fire, let us remember their wretched brothers and sisters without food, shelter, and without a master, or even a bone. A beginning has been made in the work of caring for homeless animals in New York and its suburbs by a society of benevolent ladies, who have opened the "Bide-a-Wee Home for Animals." Their crest is a heart, with an animal group in bas-relief, and these words engraved on either side, "Justice," "Compassion." They hope soon to include a Rest for horses, with a field for pasturage.

Mrs. Harry Ulysses Kibbe is the originator of the plan, her idea being to succor domestic pets in distress. She was prompted to this good work by losing her pet fox-terrier. A policeman picked him up and carried him to the pound, where she found him a few hours afterward. This experience decided her to befriend all stray dogs. The object of this Home is to provide a place, where stray, sick and wounded animals will be kept till claimed, and where they will receive medical and surgical treatment free of charge, if the owners are not able to pay. Good homes will be provided for them if not claimed by their owners.

The "Bide-a-Wee Home" is the first of its kind in New York. In Boston, there is the Gifford Sheltering Home, and there are Homes for Friendless Animals in Chicago and Washington. The Hackbridge Home, Surrey, England, is doing a good work in this department of suffering, also the Baroness Herpent Refuge in Paris. New York State has passed a law, that all animal waifs and strays seized shall be destroyed, if not claimed in twenty-four hours. The police are allowed to shoot them on the street or take them to the pound, to be drowned or asphyxiated, if no owner appears. Mrs. Kibbe does not believe in killing an animal simply because it is suffering or astray, unless it is hopelessly afflicted or incurably injured.

The "Bide a Wee Home" is situated on an elevation about one and a-half miles from Tuckahoe and two miles north of Yonkers Plains. The dog kennels are kept scrupulously clean. A cat hospital is in preparation. When the home was opened recently forty-six dogs and cats were entered upon the official list. All the animals are sent first to a veterinarian to be examined, and if not suffering with a contagious disease they are transferred to the convalescent hospital. The aim of this home is to spread the gospel of humanity toward dumb creatures by practical example. The "Bide a Wee Society" will endeavor to alleviate the miseries of every lone, neglected, or deserted dog, cat or horse on Manhattan Island and its vicinity.

Miss A. F. Gette, the manager of the Home, is an enthusiastic lover of animals, and she can call them all by their names — "Queen," "Beau," "Yellow Kid," "Runaway," "Scamp" all come in for her favor. Mr. H. K. Miller is the home veterinarian.

A well-known author said: "Every family should have a dog; it is like having a perpetual baby. It is the plaything and crony of all the house. It keeps them all young. All unite on the dog. He tells no tales, betrays no secrets, never sulks, asks no troublesome questions, never gets into debt, never comes down late for breakfast, or comes in too late to bed, is always ready for a bit of fun, and lies in wait for it." It is hoped to permanently establish the "Bide-a-Wee Home." It has been decided to make the annual membership fee $5.00 for active members, and $1.00 for associate members. Inquiries sent to Miss Harriet Bingham, 65 Morningside avenue, New York, will be promptly answered.

DEBORAH'S BEN

BY MARY LOWE DICKINSON

"THERE, girls, not another step! Now run back to mother as fast as ever you can," said Ben as he stopped with his two sisters, Nell and Bertha, in the shelter of the great tree beside the schoolhouse.

"Oh, Ben! Mother said half way, and this isn't anywhere near half," said Nell, hanging her head with a disappointed air.

"I don't mind the snow one bit," chirped Bertha, who had drawn her little woollen shawl over her curls and looked as comfortable as a snowbird.

"But I must mind for you," said Ben, straightening himself and putting his head on one side and his hands in his pockets. He tried to look very brave, but his lips trembled as he added, "It was only a squall when we started, and now it is a storm. If it kept on blowing like this you would not be able to find the road home."

"Yes, I suppose we must go back; but oh, Ben!"—Bertha's voice broke.

"Never mind, dear. I shall be home for the holidays, and I shall have two weeks' pay then, so I'll bring you something pretty," he said, turning to kiss Nell, who clung to his neck and felt something like melting snowflakes falling upon her cheeks. If they were tears he kept his head down and pretended to give his trousers an extra tuck above his knees before trudging his way through the storm. Back the girls went, hand-in-hand, to the little house where mother was waiting for them. Forward went the boy, toward the town, where he had been promised work in a large grocery store, work by which he could keep the little family together in their childhood's home.

"To keep the family together," that had been the one longing of the Widow Judson's heart and the object of her ceaseless toil ever since her husband died, when the three children were very small. And she had done it until now, by her sewing, or nursing of the sick. Brave little helpers the children had been. Ben did the work on the few stony fields, and made the soil of the little garden yield much of their food; he raised poultry, and sold the eggs and chickens; bought wood standing in the lot, and cut it himself; worked out the taxes on the roads, and, in his mother's night-nursing, was as fatherly to the young girls as if his young shoulders had supported an older head. In all his efforts, Nell was equally a comfort and a help, while the frolicsome little Bertha was the pet of both.

But with all her own and the children's efforts, a winter of scarlet fever for the little girls, and another of rheumatism for Mrs. Judson, had driven her to extremities and put that cruel thing, a mortgage, upon their little home. It was this which, combined with his mother's failing health, had driven Ben away.

"There will be one less to feed," he thought, as he remembered the piece of bread he had seen his mother put into his bag that very morning, the piece she had pretended not to want at breakfast.

Full of brave purposes for the future, with which he tried to stifle the pain of this first parting, Ben pushed on his way, sometimes almost blinded by the whirling snow. It had been snowing at intervals for two days, but when he started the weather seemed to be in a clearing squall; it proved, however, but a renewal of the storm. The highway from Enfield to his home, to the town of Norwood, was kept open by constant travel, but the snowy drifts were piled high against the hedges and stone walls. Though he made the best progress possible, it was nightfall, and, but for the snow, would have been dark long before he reached the town. As he neared the suburbs, he noticed how the snow had drifted against the picket fence that surrounded a low stone house, completely hiding the gate and the path to the door. The house looked half buried and desolate, and yet from one chimney, a faint thread of smoke seemed struggling. Ben had nearly passed, when a low cry brought him to a sudden halt. It was repeated, and this time the boy made his slow way to the rear of the house, where he found a door open, and, between the stone step and the well, the prostrate figure of a gray-haired woman.

It took but a moment to lift her in his young, strong arms, and, with many a groan and sign on her part, to help her over the threshold to a couch by the smouldering fire; then he chafed her cold hands and rubbed her forehead with a handful of snow, as her pale lips showed she was fainting.

Ben had arrived, fortunately, at the time of the accident. The overturned pitcher showed that she had started to get water from the well, and had slipped and fallen. Though quickly recovering from the faint, she seemed in great suffering. In spite of resolutely closing her lips, every breath was a stifled moan of pain. John read a question in her eyes.

"I am Ben Judson," said he. "I was going to Norwood when I heard your call. I want to run now for the doctor."

"BEN LIFTED HER IN HIS STRONG, YOUNG ARMS"

"No, no, don't leave me," cried the woman, but quickly added, "Yes, go for the doctor, and hurry. I cannot move my arm." Ben started down the main street as fast as the snow would let him, and soon found the nearest physician, and hurried back with him to the little stone house.

"First house beyond the village on the Enfield turnpike?" said the doctor. "Why, that's old Deborah Elkins' house! Wonder she let you in at all. She don't believe much in boys."

"Why not?" asked Ben. "She didn't seem afraid of me."

"Well, it's a long story," said the doctor. "She's a nice woman, is Deborah, and she was very fond of a brother, who died and left her his son, whose mother had died long before. She just gave herself, her time and her money to that boy. She was proud of him, and wanted him to be educated. But he took to drink and bad company, and she had to pay his debts over and over again, until at last"—and the doctor hesitated.

"What became of him?" asked Ben quickly.

"Well, at last he stole all of her money that he could lay his hands on, ran away to sea, and was drowned. Took the money, they admit, and was flying west as fast as he could go when he died. Anyhow, he never came back or returned. That last blow was too much for Miss Deborah. She shut up her house and herself, and has lived alone ever since. If there is one thing she hates, you'll go around the corner to avoid it's a boy."

"I fear is the house," said Ben.

"Yes, I know it," answered the doctor as he hastened within, leaving Ben, to go to the stable. Before this was done, the physician hurried back to the door.

"Here, my boy, drive back to town as quickly as you can and get me assistance. Tell him to bring the other, and be lively; we have a broken collarbone to deal with."

Ben had to return with the other man without the assistant, who had been called away. The doctor grumbled and growled, but it ended in his calling upon the boy to help him, and Ben proved so skillful that he asked him where he learned to care for the sick.

"I never learned," replied the boy, "but sometimes in mother's hard times I've watched at night and helped her litt the patients."

"And where is your mother?"

"At home in Enfield," said Ben, "but she is not strong enough for such work now, or she would take beautiful care of this lady."

"I don't know where to look to-night," said the doctor, "and yet she must have care. Can you stay while I go and try to find some one?"

"Yes, but I ought to go on to Mr. Brown's, the grocer's, sometime this evening. If I don't I may lose the place."

"Your place is here, my boy," said the doctor authoritatively. "I know Brown. I'll see him on my way home," and before Ben realized his position he was left to care for the suffering woman. She lay with her eyes closed and silent for a while. At last she said abruptly:

"So your name is Ben? I never speak that name. Have you no other?"

"My full name is Benjamin Willis Judson," replied the lad. "Willis was my mother's family name."

Another long silence and then the sound of sleigh bells drew near. In a moment the doctor entered with a woman well wrapped up, but in whom Ben at once recognized his mother.

"Why, mother, you are not strong enough for this," he cried anxiously, but the doctor looked on in triumph.

"She will be strong enough for you are to help her," he said. "She can tell you what to do, and I must stay to put Miss Elkins through."

"But my girls," said Ben.

"Nell is coming to help tend the sick room," said his mother, "and the doctor will have to find Bertha [illegible] make him a cook."

So it was all settled, and there followed a fortnight of such a [illegible] as poor old Deborah had never known in all her lonely years. Miss Stone's Appeal

IN the whole range of Christian effort, it would be difficult to find a brighter and nobler exemplification of the true missionary spirit than that which characterizes and dignifies the beautiful appeal from the pen of Miss Ellen M. Stone, which appears in another part of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Miss Stone has spent the greater part of her life as a Christian teacher among the villages of Macedonia. Forgetting all that she endured two years ago, during her strange and perilous captivity, she has turned, with a heart overflowing with sympathy and compassion, toward that ancient people, and she has given voice and expression to their cry for help, as she would plead for her own sisters and brothers were they suffering. It is a touching story, and her pen invests it with a pathos that none may resist.

We urge all who have the cause of human suffering and the advancement of Christ's Kingdom at heart, to read Miss Stone's letter. Coming at this season, as Christmas draws near, the "Macedonian cry" should not pass unheeded. Let us answer it by generously and promptly sending in our mites to aid the relief work which has already begun under the personal direction of the missionaries in the field. We have already forwarded a few contributions, but these are merely a drop in the bucket. All the missionaries unite in supplementing Miss Stone's appeal on behalf of the 200,000 refugees, who are liable to perish unless aid arrives quickly. These unfortunates are Christians—members of the same great household of faith as ourselves, and our spiritual kith and kin. Let our Christmas gift to our suffering brothers and sisters in Macedonia be a strong, loving and helping hand, reached out quickly to save. Your individual gift to the relief fund, however small, may be blessed to the saving of a precious life. Could there be a nobler or more Christlike way of celebrating Christmas than this?

The Saloon in a New Light

IT has been estimated that 100,000 human beings are slain by strong drink every year in the United States. This frightful annual tragedy lies at the door of the saloon-keeper, though he would be powerless, if the people themselves were minded to do away with the evil. But facts that have recently come to light regarding the traffic in certain towns in New Jersey show that the rum-seller is not content with this horrible harvest of death. It is not big enough to suit him; he yearns for victims on a vaster scale. As the old-time priests of Juggernaut encouraged the fanatical Hindus to fling themselves to be ground under the idol's car-wheels, so the saloon-keeper has devised new ways of persuading the devotees of rum to hasten their own destruction. And the methods by which this was accomplished and put on "a paying business basis" for the rumseller, reveal a depth of depravity that is well-nigh unimaginable.

In one city, a number of saloon-keepers originated the first venture, "strictly in the line of business." They insured the lives of those of their customers who were the hardest drinkers, taking out the policies themselves and paying the premiums, the customers not even knowing that they were insured. But in every instance, the insured was a marked man. He would drink at the bar, the liquor-seller serving him gleefully, urging him to more liberal potations, and paying the premium on his life with the profits. Then, when the poor drunkard closed his career in the hospital or the river, the saloon-keeper would collect the insurance and look around for the next victim.

This grim gambling with death has been found to exist in certain localities to a startling extent. One saloon-keeper held nearly a hundred policies on the lives of frequenters of his dive, and cleared $18,000 by the speculation. He declared that the profits on this abominable traffic in death policies was one of the principal attractions that kept him in the business. Remorselessly he planned to kill both the soul and the body of his poor victims, making them wretched and miserable in this life, and hopeless for the life to come. Some of the insured men, who did not die fast enough, seem to have been helped out of the way by hired thugs and the skilful application of bludgeons; but, of course, the virtuous saloon-keepers were quite above suspicion in such cases.

Let it be known everywhere, that the poor, besotted drinker, dead or alive, is a profit to the saloon-keeper, and his most valuable asset. What a shudder would convulse the crowds in the average barroom, if they knew that many who were drinking there were being carried secretly by the whisky seller on "groggery policies," and that the holder was intensely interested in their early demise. Such a revelation would be dynamic in its results; it would be more startling than a score of temperance sermons.

Christmas Thoughts

From the Writings of the Late DR. TALMAGE

WHAT a Christmas morning it will make when those with whom you used to keep the holidays are all around you in heaven! Silver-haired old father young again, and mother who had so many aches and pains and decrepitudes well again, and all your brothers and sisters and the little ones. How glad they will be to see you!

BRIGHT Christmas morning of my soul's delight. Chime all the bells. Wreath all the garlands. Rouse all the anthems. Shake hands in all the congratulations. Merry Christmas! Merry with the thought of sins forgiven, merry with the idea of sorrows comforted, merry with the raptures to come. Oh! lift that Christ from the manger and lay him down in all our hearts. We may not bring to him as costly a present as the Magi brought, but we bring to his feet, and to the manger to-day the frankincense of our joy, the pearls of our tears, the kiss of our love, the prostration of our worship. Down at his feet, all churches, all ages, all earth, all heaven. Down all worlds at his feet and worship. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men!"

THROUGH the revelation of Christmas night I find that religion is not a groan, but a song. In a world of sin, and sick beds, and sepulchres, we must have trouble; but in the darkest night the heavens part with angelic song. You may, like Paul, be shipwrecked, but I exhort you to be of good cheer, for you who are trusting on Christ shall all escape safe to the land. Religion does not show itself in the elongation of the face and the cut of the garb. The Pharisee who puts his religion into his phylactery has none left for his heart. Fretfulness and complaining do not belong to the family of Christian graces which move into the heart when the devil moves out. Christianity does not frown upon amusements and recreations. It is not a cynic, it is not a shrew, it chokes no laughter, it quenches no light, it defaces no art. Among the happy, it is the happiest. It is just as much at home on the playground as it is in the church.

IT was a winter month that God chose for his Son's nativity. Had he been born in the month of May—that is the season of blossoms; had he been born in the month of June—that is the season of roses; had he been born in the month of July—that is the season of great harvest; had he been born in the month of September—that is the season of ripe orchards; had he been born in the month of October—that is the season of upholstered forests. But he was born in the month of December, when there are no flowers blooming out-of-doors, and when all the harvests that have not been gathered up have perished, and when there are no fruits ripening on the hill, and when the leaves are drifted over earth. In was in closing December that he was born to show that this is a Christ for people in sharp blast, for people under clouded sky, for people with frosted hopes, for people with thermometer below zero, for people snowed under. That is the reason he is so often found among the destitute.

JESUS started an influence that will go on until the last desert will grow roses, and the last weak lung make full inhalation, and the last case of paresis take healthful brain, and the last illness become rubicund of cheek and robust of chest and bounding of foot, and the last pauper will get his palace, and the last sinner taken unto the warm bosom of a pardoning God! Where did all these start? In that cradle within sound of bleating sheep and bellowing cattle, and amid rough bantering of herdsmen and camel-drivers. What a low place to start for such great heights! O artists! turn your camera obscura on that village of Bethlehem. Take it all in—the wintry skies lowering, the flocks shivering in the chill air, Mary, the pale mother, and Jesus the child. No wonder that Paul Veronese, and Cuyp, and Rubens, and Tintoretto, and Correggio, and Perugino, and Ghirlandajo, and Raphael put their best pencils in that scene. Lord God! by thy Spirit, fix that Madonna in all our souls! So these thoughts come in upon us at this gladdest part of the year!

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The New Bridge

GOOD news for many thousands of people was given in the announcement that the new bridge, connecting Brooklyn with New York, was completed, and would be formally accepted by the municipality on Dec. 19. The statement was as welcome to people who will not use it, as to those who will. At present more than 150,000 persons make the trip over the bridge now in use, every morning and return in the evening. The crowding, especially in the evening, is terrific. Bridge cars and surface cars are filled to their utmost capacity, and the struggle to get on board either is fierce and exhausting. The hope of those who will continue to use the present bridge, after the new one is formally opened, is that so many thousands will use the new bridge that the crush at the old one will be relieved. The formal opening of the new structure will not, however, give immediate relief. The rails are not yet laid either for trolley cars or for bridge cars, so that the only way to get across it is either to walk or drive. That was the situation at first, with the present structure; but it was soon improved, and the precedent will doubtless be followed in this case. As it now stands, the new bridge is one of the finest in the world. It crosses the river at a place about a mile north of the present bridge, from which it differs in many respects, the most noticeable being that the towers, which support the cables, are of steel instead of masonry. The length of the main span is 1,600 feet, which, with the approaches, makes the entire length of the bridge 7,200 feet. Its width is 118 feet, which is thirty-three feet wider than the other bridge. This is used to accommodate two elevated tracks, four surface-car tracks, two roadways for wagons, two cycle paths and roadway for pedestrians. The construction was begun on Oct. 28, 1896, and so far it has cost $8,582,220. The formal opening on Dec. 19 is to be a public festivity. The Board of Aldermen has appropriated $20,000 to pay the cost of the celebration. Several companies of soldiers belonging to New York and Brooklyn regiments will form an escort, and three thousand distinguished guests are invited. The mayor and aldermen and guests will proceed to the middle of the span, where the ceremony takes place. At night there will be a pyrotechnic display. On Monday, Dec. 21, the general public will be admitted to the bridge. Pedestrians, however, will have to use the roadway for some weeks, as the footpath will not be completed until spring. When the rails are laid and the cars running, many thousands will cross it daily, to go to their labor in the morning and to rest in the evening, and will be glad that their journey in both cases is shortened by its facilities. The time must come for every one when those journeys end. Well will it be then, for those who have put their trust in Him, who "dedicated for us a new and living way through the veil," for they will find, as they approach the dark river of death, that their crossing has been made easy for them unto eternal rest.

To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace (Luke i. 79).

THE NEW BRIDGE OVER THE EAST RIVER, NEW YORK, TO BE OPENED DECEMBER 19

A New Electric Light

An invention by a son of the late Abram S. Hewitt, of New York, which was regarded at its first appearance as a mere scientific toy, turns out to have uses of considerable value. It is an electric lamp, the principle of which is very simple. The electric currents flow into a sealed tube, in which there is a mercurial vapor. At either end of the tube are electrodes, positive and negative. When a high current is turned on, the resistance is broken down by the presence of the vapor and the tube is filled with light. The light has a violet tinge, which shades into a pale greenish hue. It has no red rays and therefore is somewhat ghastly. Its advantage is that a very high voltage, which ordinarily would give a blinding light, can be used without hurting the eyes. It would be of no use where colors have to be matched, but where men work with drills or other tools, or need strong light, as they bend at night over compositors' cases, it is invaluable. A light which is powerful and yet restful to the eyes has long been sought, and this is precisely the light the new lamp gives. But as it transforms colors, it is obvious that there are places in which it would be worse than useless. In the moral world such a light would be mischievous. Men are now only too ready, when personal gain is involved, to look so longingly on a black act, as to regard it as gray, and eventually as pure white.

If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness! (Matt. vi. 23).

Eliminating a Father

An application by a father for permission to see his seven-year-old son has been brought before the Supreme Court in New York, and judgment was given in an exhaustive report by Justice Leventritt, a few days ago. The applicant's wife had sued for a decree of separation previously, and it had been granted. The custody of the son of the couple had been awarded to the mother, with alimony to the extent of about one-third of the man's income. He had called on his wife to see his son, but she had refused, and he thereupon applied to the courts for an order compelling his wife to allow him to see the child. This was opposed, and finally the case was carried to the Supreme Court, which has now rejected the application. In pronouncing judgment, Justice Leventritt said that the man had been "guilty of refined cruelty, which would have justified the wife in obtaining a divorce instead of separation. His moral tenets were of a character that, if sanctioned and adhered to, would shake every basic principle on which our social order is founded. Looking beyond the parties to the suit, and considering solely the interests of the child, his future welfare demands the elimination of the father as a possible influence in the development of his character." Unhappily, there are many fathers, the elimination of whom would be good for their children; but the courts do not interfere unless an appeal is made to them, and not then, unless the influence is unmistakably evil. God, however, will surely exact retribution of all those parents who set their children an evil example.

Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock? What wilt thou say when he shall punish thee? (Jer. xiii. 20).

Mothers Confused

A photographer at Monongahela, Pa., has a difficulty to solve that recalls the famous case submitted to Solomon. The proud mother of a six-months-old baby brought her child to be photographed. She approved the negative when the photographer showed it to her, and ordered half a dozen prints, which she promised to call for. The next day another mother from a nearby village came with a baby of about the age of the one photographed the day before, and she ordered a dozen copies. When the first caller came for her prints she seized those prepared for the other woman, and declared that they were pictures of her baby. The second mother produced the pictures which the photographer insisted were those of her own child, and refused to take them. She was so positive about it that the photographer concluded that he had mixed the negatives. He, therefore, offered the half dozen he had prepared for the second customer when she came for the portraits, but she too, refused to accept them, and insisted that it was explained to her that the photographer was right in his original opinion. That was unsatisfactory to her, and the other woman was certainly mistaken. The photographer was puzzled, but advised her to take the remainder of the pictures he had originally prepared for her, and printed another half dozen to replace those taken by the other mother. Since then he has received a letter from the woman whom he believes to be mistaken, saying that all her friends consider the portrait of the child an excellent one, and ordering more copies of it. So he has at least a negative which each mother regards as a portrait of her special baby, and one negative which neither can recognize. Perhaps, in a year or two, there will be no chance of such confusion. Each child will have developed so that a portrait of one would not be mistaken for that of the other. The spiritual features will change more as the years pass. Even among the grown-up children of God there is less resemblance of character than there would be if all were conformed to Christ's image.

BRIEF NOTES

A WOMAN'S ADVENTURE ON THE ISTHMUS

Captured as a Colombian Spy and Held Prisoner for Eight Days By the Insurgents—The New Republic's Birth-throes

By ANNABEL LEE

ISTHMUS SOLDIERS ON PARADE

NATIVE WATER-CARRIERS FOR THE ISTHMUS TROOPS

PANAMANIANS ON THE MARCH

A NEW republic has been launched in the events of the universe, and Tuesday, the third of November, will be celebrated hereafter as Panama's national day. It was not my good fortune to be present at the birth of the new republic, but I witnessed some of the expiring struggles of the old.

During the revolution of 1901 and 1902, I was on the isthmus. The insurgent army at that time was encamped at Chorrera, about thirty miles north of Panama, in the heart of the Andes Mountains. For three years this body of troops had lived in the wilderness, upon what fate and perseverance gave them from the sea and land. This military force was recruited by Colombian Indians and Jamaicans, and was commanded by General Domingo Diaz, the present commander-in-chief of the new republic. I determined upon a visit to the revolutionary camp. I asked United States Consul-General Gudger's advice upon the feasibility of the trip, and he assured me that when I once reached camp, I would have no difficulty; that he knew the commander-in-chief, who was a personal friend, and he would give me a letter of credentials to carry to him.

GENERAL JESUS LUGO

(X) GEN. DOMINGO DIAZ, NOW CIVIL AND MILITARY COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF AT PANAMA

GENERAL BARRERA

There remained but one thing to do. I needed a horse and a guide to pilot me there. I did not acquaint the Governor of Panama with my determination. A woman required no passport; and, besides, a passport from the Government would be of little value in a revolutionary camp. So I thought it best to go without his Excellency's knowledge. The next morning at an early hour I arrived at Empire, a station on the Panama railroad line. Here I was delayed some five hours, arranging for my transportation.

One must be acquainted with the social customs of these Spanish colonies, to realize what my going meant to a people whose women lead such exclusive lives.

Advice was freely given by the strangers who had gathered to witness our departure for the region of guerrilla warfare; but I was still resolved, and at noon we left the station. All through the village we were hailed by words of warning shouted in the liquid language of their nativity, and three hours later we were halted by a rebel scout with a Remington rifle. We had been expecting him, but were surprised to find him so near the railroad line, and my most vivid impression was one of joy. My guide did not share my feeling. Anyone who has visited a tropical jungle, and who knows, too, the condition of the mountain trails during the wet season, will not wonder at my good spirits in being arrested. There had been seventeen inches of rainfall that week, and any release from the uncertainty of what was to come, I welcomed as a deliverance. Besides, I felt secure in the possession of the letter given me by Gen. Gudger and depended upon its reception to instal me in the friendship of my new hosts.

The revolutionary forces were camped in three divisions, and to Camp Arado I was taken on the first night. I was suffering from the bites of insects; my arms bled from contact with the bushes, and my bedraggled appearance did not inspire Commanding General Barrera with confidence. Word of my presence in camp was immediately sent to headquarters, and an order came forthwith to bring the American and Colombian spies to to Chorrera for court martial. Our military procession, consisting of seven prisoners and double that number of guards arrived in Chorrera on the following evening, and half an hour later I stood before the military tribunal. My letter from Consul Gudger, with the U. S. seal, was the open sesame to my welcome in camp; but I was cross-questioned severely before the court, and finally admitted as a guest to the military realm. Here I was entertained for eight days by the insurgent band.

By day I was taken for horseback rides through mountain fastnessess and through bamboo forests, and at night I listened to the thrilling tales told by my adventurous knights. One story that had peculiar interest for me—one that shows the daring of these founders of the new republic—was the capture of the steam yacht Darien, in Chorrera Bay. The Colombian Government always kept a vigilant armed vessel near the rebel port, to protect the smaller sea craft from falling into insurgent hands. One day, the captain of the Darien had not reckoned on the falling tide (which rises seventeen feet on the Pacific side), and to his dismay, the Darien was grounded. The revolutionists at once saw the situation, and nine armed men, under command of General Lugo, flanked and waded out to the yacht through mud and ooze, waist deep, firing at intervals, until a white flag appeared above the gunwale. The officers made no resistance, and when the revolutionists came aboard they found them all under the bunkers. The men were made prisoners, and when the tide came in the Darien was floated, and in six hours the yacht, controlled by the enemy, was on its way to a Colombian port. The prisoners were compelled to write to the commander of this port to come to the vessel for an important conference. The Colombian commander, still thinking that the Darien was in control of the Government, obeyed. He, too, was made prisoner, and compelled to write ashore for ammunition and arms.

They did not encourage my desire to explore among their fortifications; but the tingle of great events was in the air, and they volunteered the information, when I left them eight days later, that something would occur in forty-eight hours. I came out under a flag of truce to a Government dredger, used by the Colombians as a battleship, and here I must admit I had grave misgivings. Our mast carried the white flag, but there was no sign from the Government gunboat, and the chattering of the sailors told too plainly of their suspicions. Presently, a small boat was lowered away from the dredger and a soiled Turkish towel floated on the air. That, then, was the sign that all was well. I was left aboard the dredger to be transferred to the Boyaca, a Colombian battleship, later on. The Boyaca was long overdue; a tropical storm had for ten hours swept the unsheltered deck of the dredger; in fact the only sheltered spot about the boat was a row of shelves used by the men for bunks. At midnight, the commander informed me that the Boyaca would not arrive before morning, and entreated me to try a blanket and a bunk until the ship hove in sight. I was nervous and tired. I had worn rubber boots throughout the day, and my clothes were damp; but the engineer offered to dry them in the room below, and I lay down upon that shelf in a state bordering on hysteria. The revolutionary generals at Chorrera had given me a history of their battles for three years, their privations of the past and hopes for the future. This information I had written out, and I carried the manuscript in a package, under my luxuriant coil of hair. There was nothing incriminating in this information; it was merely history, from their point of view; but it was a thing I treasured and to me a possession. At three o'clock A.M. I was awakened by a terrible din. Whistles were blowing and the men aboard were shouting ear-splitting orders to the Boyaca. My hair had fallen about my shoulders, and the carefully concealed letter lay exposed to view: but of this no one took notice. I spent my time in replacing this letter and had no opportunity to dress. I was hurried into a small boat, to be carried to the battleship, and managed to put on my boots before I reached the gangway.

The Governor of Panama was aboard, but he was too concerned about coming events to give me a cross-examination, and the next day, at noon, I was put aboard the United States ship Iowa.

At Panama, I was beset on all sides to tell what I knew of the revolution, and my unequivocal answers that I knew nothing, were received with suspicion. I was threatened by the government, and Captain Perry, of the Iowa, asked me to do no traveling without a United States marine guard. Frequently the State Department at Washington was notified by Colombian officers that I was a menace to the peaceful relations of the government, and a careful watch was kept upon my movements. Two days after my return from the interior the revolutionists seized Colon. It was the same army with which I had spent eight days. It had been arranged to make a simultaneous attack upon Panama, but part of the troops were lost in the jungle that night and another division was lost in the marsh, and did not find its way out until a week later—too late to be of assistance to their friends—and so Colon capitulated.

While the revolutionists held Colon they commanded the sympathy and respect of every naval officer in port. At one time there were seven foreign battleships in the bay. Their earnestness and fairness won the admiration of all. They were opposed to the centralization of power assumed by Colombia's dictatorial president. The president appointed the governor of Panama, a man from the interior. The governor in turn appointed all subordinate officers, and these were men from the interior. No Panamanian was allowed to hold office; yet Panama revenues were confiscated by the powers at Bogota. The Isthmus has furnished millions upon millions of dollars, since Panama united with Colombia in 1821, but Bogota took all and gave only unkept promises.

As soon as the canal treaty ratified no chance of interference from the men who had flown their wives in secret but were united with the other factions on the isthmus and all planned secrecy the result which has just astonished the world. At first there were but four interested actors, Colonel Dosser, editor of the Panama Star and Herald, Professor Tracy, Dr. Manuel Amador and Amador Arrocemena. These worked quietly for two months and then took the leaders of all political factions into their confidence to degrees. They decided that the revolt should occur the day the Colombian Congress was to adjourn, September 25; but this was after ward postponed until November 3.

The attitude of the United States was well understood by the Panamanians as exemplified by previous occurrences, so they felt secure that if once they were in possession of the isthmus Colombia would not be permitted to fight over the railroad. The actual change of possession took place at half past five in the evening. It was a complete surprise. The movement was opposed by no one on the isthmus. The Colombian generals and their staffs were made prisoners; then all united in the festal celebration. Panama was free.

"A GREATER THAN SOLOMON IS HERE"

❋ The Queen of Sheba Visits Solomon

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC 20 I KINGS 10: 1-10

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--PSALM. 29: 2: "WHEN THE RIGHTEOUS ARE IN AUTHORITY THE PEOPLE REJOICE"

A LETTER from Zaida, a young girl of Shechem, visiting Jerusalem at the time of the visit of the Queen of Sheba:

"My Dear Parents: How highly favored I am to be in Jerusalem at this time. Almost beyond the power of words to describe is the everyday grandeur of this city, made so by the genius and wealth of King Solomon; but it is surpassingly grand in its holiday attire to welcome the Queen of South Arabia, who is to be the honored guest of King Solomon. We are told of wonderful preparations over there in the palace. It is said that the king has had a glass floor put over a pond in which gold fish are swimming. It is supposed that when the queen is conducted over this she will think she is to walk through the water, and that it will then be discovered whether or not she is cloven-footed, as has been reported. The gossips also say that the queen has been preceded by a company who have tested King Solomon's wisdom, and carried back word to their queen to assure her that it is quite worth her while to come and see for herself. It is said that these forerunners brought a letter from the queen to the king, and that he told them the contents of it before they presented it; that she also sent a casket containing an unperforated pearl, a diamond intricately pierced, and a crystal goblet, with the request that he should perforate the pearl, thread the diamond, and fill the goblet with water that had neither dropped from the clouds, nor gushed forth from the earth. It is said that our king laughed at these problems, that he perforated the pearl with a stone known only to himself; that he threaded the diamond by inserting a small worm which spun a silken thread and drew it through; and that he filled the goblet with the perspiration of a horse which he had caused to be rapidly driven. I do not know that these things are so, but I rather think the stories were started by the presence of a company of people from South Arabia being in the city a few days several weeks ago. Since beginning this letter I have heard that the great queen is approaching the city, that her camel train has been discerned by the watchmen in the towers of the city walls. I will now lay down my pen to take it up again when I can tell you what my eyes have seen.

"A number of days have come and gone since I stopped in the writing of this letter, and I have now so much to tell you that it seems impossible that a letter can contain it all. The great queen has come and gone! You will be glad for me when I tell you that I was one of a company of maidens invited by the king to form an inner circle in front of the guard on the day of the queen's presentation. I saw her hesitate for a moment as she advanced to that crystal pavement. Her dainty feet were plainly to be seen as her attendants gathered up her robes to prevent them from getting wet! But I must not forget to tell you that I saw her camel train threading its way over Mount Olivet as she approached the city. It looked like a ribbon of variegated colors stretched across the mountain, so gay and so many were the trappings of the camels. The movement of the camels gave the effect of the ribbon fluttering in the wind.

"But how shall I describe to you the company I saw on the day that King Solomon took the queen to view the city of Jerusalem, and particularly to show her the House of God. The king had all his chariots in line, one thousand four hundred in all, and all of his horses, twenty-two thousand in number. The riders of these horses were dressed in Tyrian purple, and their long hair was sprinkled with gold dust, so that 'their heads sparkled with the reflection of the sunbeams from the gold' as I heard one man say. The king himself rode in a chariot dressed in dazzling white, in the midst of these horsemen, while his queen guest rode upon her camel, which was bedecked with chains of gold studded with gems, and caparisoned with rich cloths that looked like mosaics of precious stones. The road just behind the king's chariot was dazzling to look upon.

"I have been told that the queen was greatly impressed by the wisdom of King Solomon, because he was able to answer all of the hard questions she had to ask him, and which no one in her own country could answer. I understand that she was amazed at the magnificence with which Solomon was surrounded; his palace of cedar, his ivory throne, the costly furniture of his table, the delicacy and abundance of food, the large retinue of servants, that she had almost fainted, and she afterwards said that 'the half had not been told her.'"

Illustration and Application

On this Sunday before Christmas, the most appropriate text for this lesson is the one (Matt. 12: 42), in which Jesus himself repeats this story: "The Queen of the South shall rise up in the judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it; for she came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and behold, a greater than Solomon is here." That means, they are greatest sinners who reject the greatest light. Surely then the Queen of Sheba shall condemn yet more than the Pharisees who rejected Christ when he was upon earth; those who rejected him when Christmas recalls his wonderful works in nineteen Christian centuries.

An old legend tells that Saint Macarius of Alexandra, who dwelt among the tombs, one day took up a skull, and looked at it, and said to it: "Who are you?" The skull took a voice and replied: "I am a Pagan." Again the saint looked at it, and asked a further question: "Where are you?" Came the reply: "In hell." "How deep is hell?" went on the saint. "Deeper than earth is from heaven." "Are there any deeper in hell than you?" "Yes," said the skull, "the Jews are deeper in hell than I am." "Are there any deeper in hell than the Jews?" "Yes," said the skull; "there is a deeper depth yet. There are those that listened to the Gospel and obeyed it not."

What is it like in the Bible?

The coming of the magi to Christ is a suggestive parallel, but the closest parallel to this story in the Bible is in Acts 8th, the treasurer of Candace, who had heard in Ethiopia of the true worship at Jerusalem and came to see the temple and worship in it, but found "One greater than the Temple" in Isaiah 53d, as interpreted by Philip in that wayside sermon. That public official, accustomed to handle treasure, found the supreme treasure, the "Greater than Solomon" and carried back in his glad soul greater gifts than those borne by the great train of the Queen of Sheba.

What is it like in Nature?

When we enter the kingdom of nature, we find all about us evidence of a wise King, who has made the world a palace of combined utility and beauty.

Some of you have heard the story of the portrait of Dante, painted on one of the walls of the Bargello, in Florence. At one time it was only a tradition that such a painting existed, as the years had seemingly utterly effaced it. The very room, hallowed by the sacred memory of the great Florentine, had been converted into a storehouse for various sorts of rubbish. One day an artist entered the place. He gave orders to remove the rubbish and clean the walls. Then, with infinite patience, he scraped away the outer covering. Under his hand, the outline of a face gradually shaped itself forth; colors, long hidden by the rude plastering, began to appear; one by one, every line and distinction of feature stood out, until finally, men came from the ends of the earth to look with mute admiration upon the pictured face of the great Dante. So, as we delve in nature, we find a face, a mind of intelligence back of it all, which Colossians and Hebrews and John tell us is the mind of Christ, by whom God made the world. The greatest of living scientists, Lord Kelvin, has recently declared the old argument from design, though sometimes marred by fanciful claims, is still valid. "Overpoweringly strong proofs of intelligent and benevolent design lie all around us."

What is it like in History?

Incidents of Queen Victoria's devout adoration of the Greater than Solomon, may fitly illustrate the higher typical meanings of the Queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon.

At the conclusion of her coronation, Handel's "Messiah" was sung. All others rose, but she had been told it would be improper and undignified for her to do so. But when the grand finale was reached: "King of kings and Lord of lords," she could sit no longer. She rose, and meekly bowed her crowned head and folded her hands across her breast, in token of submission to the Divine King.

Another more familiar story of like significance is told by Archdeacon Farrar, one of her chaplains. After hearing one of her chaplains preach, at Windsor, on the second advent of Christ, she spoke to him saying, "Oh, how I wish that the Lord might come during my lifetime." "Why," asked the preacher, "does your Majesty feel this very earnest desire?" With a countenance lighted by deep emotion, the Queen replied, "I should so love to lay my crown at his feet."

It is fitting here to introduce the story of a lowly woman, whose brave service to her country made her one of the "uncrowned queens," a rank to which every faithful woman shall come before God. Amid the beautiful hills of France, surrounded by sunny vineyards, lies the little village of Domremy, the only village of its kind in the world. It pays no taxes. Four centuries ago King Charles decreed this, declaring that when it gave to France Joan of Arc, it completed for all time its tale of service.

Not mine to mount to courts where seraphs sing,
Or glad archangels soar on outstretched wing;
Not mine in unison with celestial choirs
To sound heaven's trump, or strike the gentler wires;
Not mine to stand enrolled at crystal gates,
Where Michael thunders or where Uriel waits.
But lesser worlds a Father's kindness know;
Be mine some simple service here below—
To weep with those who weep, their joys to share,
Their pain to solace, or their burdens bear;
Some widow in her agony to meet;
Some exile in his new-found home to greet;
To serve some child of thine, and so serve thee—
Lo, here am I! To such a work send me.

The Queen of Sheba made a journey of months to get to Solomon, but we can very quickly get to the "Greater than Solomon," for He is "here." We must, however, go to Him in the right way, and what that is an old Indian learned in a dream.

"Bishop, I had a dream last night. May I tell it to you?" said an old Indian of North America. "Yes, if you have the strength," replied the bishop, who had called to see one of his members, who was ill. "I climbed up the stairs to heaven, all so weary and out of breath, but I reached it and knocked at the door. It opened at once. I stepped inside, and then an angel said, 'You are not rightly clad for this place. Did they not tell you below? Your garments are stained and worn.' What could I answer? I saw the golden steps and the golden crowns, and I heard the beautiful music; and as I looked round I did feel as if I had no business there. I said to him, 'I have come to see my son.' 'He is over there,' said the angel. As I looked, I saw Jesus, and at once strove to get to him, but I could not get on at all. The angel seeing me struggling, said, 'Paul, what are you trying to do?' 'I am trying to get to Jesus.' 'You cannot get there like that—we never do.' 'How then shall I go? Tell me, and I will do it.' 'Go on your knees,' replied the angel. I fell on my knees in a moment, and before I could attempt to go forward, I felt that Jesus stood beside me, and as I looked up I saw nothing else in heaven." We can get to Jesus very quickly if we go on our knees.

There is another dream that reminds us that the lowliest of earth may have the palaces in heaven if they love God and man, and show it in life and deed, while the selfish and unfaithful that have palaces here may have the smallest places there. A woman who lived in a lordly castle dreamed that she died, and was escorted by an angel to heaven where she saw homes prepared large and small. Pointing to a castle of beauty, such as she had occupied on earth, she asked the angels, "Whose abode is that?" "Your gardener's, who was so full of kindly deeds," said the angel. "I had hoped it was mine," the woman replied. "He lived in a very small cottage on earth." At last, having passed many houses, the angel pointed to a very small cottage and said to the woman, "That is yours." "Indeed," she answered, "I could never be happy in that after living in so great a castle below." The angel replied, "We have done the very best we could with the materials you sent up." We shall lay up treasures in heaven, material for our own mansions if we go to the Christ at this Christmas to get more of his spirit, and then go down from our heights of wealth and culture and privilege to illuminate as he did, the darkness of poverty. We may well close with the words of an uncrowned queen of literature, George Eliot:

Oh, may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence—live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues.

So to live is heaven:
To make undying music in the world,
Breathing as beauteous order that controls
With growing sway the growing life of man.

Christmas at Grace Church

BY MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

"WHAT shall we do for Christmas this year?" asked the superintendent of Grace Church Sunday School of his officers and teachers, gathered together in counsel.

"Oh, the same old thing, I suppose," observed Mr. Smith, the secretary. "There is nothing but a tree will satisfy the children."

"That is exactly where you are right, Mr. Smith," said Miss Lansing, teacher of the primary department. "A tree, and a big tree—two are better—is about the only thing that fills the bill at Christmas, as far as the children are concerned. There was a good deal of dissatisfaction last year, you remember, because we ventured a ship instead of a tree. My tots grumbled a whole lot about it."

"A tree is so much trouble. I wish we might be able to dispense with it," said Mrs. Burroughs, who had a class of half-grown boys and did not know what to do with them. "We always have such a time to get a suitable one, in the first place, and then the decorating and hanging the gifts, and the dreadful cleaning up afterward. I dread to see one come into the church."

"Well, so do I," said Arthur Pratt, who was librarian, and substitute for half the classes in the Sunday School; "but not to have a tree is going to break the hearts of 150 children."

"I do not think so," said Mr. Harper, the superintendent, thoughtfully. "The fact is, you can make children almost anything you want them to be, provided you go at it right. They are really little men and women, and they love to be treated as such. Now, I have been thinking seriously over this thing, and I believe a change in the Christmas programme would be most acceptable to all, and would prove a benefit and pleasure also, if managed properly. The truth is, friends, we are too selfish entirely in our observance of Christ's birthday. Instead of regarding it as a day holy unto the Lord, and a day to bring gifts unto him, we treat it as our feast day, and look for gifts of loving remembrance ourselves. Now, I do not want you to misunderstand me. I consider it a beautiful custom and all right to give to each other, but, in doing so, we ought not to forget Christ, the author of all this peace and good-will. We monopolize the day, and we ought not to do it; and it is my opinion that we are wronging the children in doing it; we are making them selfish and forgetful of the very spirit of Christmas. Of course Christ is not with us personally to receive the gifts which we would, probably, bestow upon him were that possible; but his poor are always with us, and you know what he said: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye do it unto me.'"

"Well, what is your idea?" asked young Pratt, busily sharpening a pencil. "Don't leave us to suffer these painful forebodings; give us the benefit of your weekly meditation about the matter. If there is any way of climbing out of a tree I am going to vote for it."

"My idea is simply this," said Mr. Harper, smiling on the little group; "suppose we put aside Christmas trees, ships, chimneys, and everything of the kind this year, and for once make a down-right good donation to the poor. Every one of us give, every child, no matter how small. Let them feel and understand that they are giving to Jesus. Children are generous little things, and, my word for it, they will be more than satisfied with this way of celebrating Christmas."

"Why, I believe they will, too," said Mrs. Snyder, who had a house full of little ones at home, and who certainly knew a good deal about childish manners and customs. "I know we can get them interested, and even very pleasantly excited over it; and we can arrange a nice entertainment of some kind, and I am sure they will enjoy it. Beside, the children, generally, do not care for the inexpensive gifts and sacks of cheap candy which we hang on the tree for them. My children do not care to eat theirs at all. It is money thrown away to buy them."

"I am exactly of your mind, Mrs. Snyder," said Mrs. Burroughs; "the children have such a superabundance at their homes, they do not know how to appreciate what we can afford to place on the Christmas tree for them."

A little further discussion of the matter resulted in the plan being unanimously adopted. Then came the delicate business of presenting it tactfully to the different classes. Miss Lansing was doubtful about it, but there was not a class in the Grace Church Sunday School more eager to launch out in this benevolent enterprise than the forty little tots composing the primary department. In fact, the new idea was well received generally, and preparations were at once begun to carry it out in the most approved manner.

"THE YOUNG LADIES CAME FORWARD WITH PIES, DOUGHNUTS, ETC."

The church was beautifully decorated in bunting and holly, and the walls ornamented with Scripture texts in green and gold. A great silver star, lit with a score of candles, was fastened up behind the platform, and the platform itself banked with ferns and palms and flowering plants from the different homes. When the crowd began to arrive as early as half past six on Christmas Eve, there was no longer any question about there being a decided interest in the plan.

An admission fee of a potato was charged at the door, and there was a great deal of fun because some had forgotten, or had not understood, and were obliged to make a call on the corner grocery in order to obtain their "tickets," as nothing but a potato was accepted. There were almost two barrels full when the church was filled—aisles, galleries and all.

Amid the merry jingling of bells Santa Claus appeared, red and rosy with his tussle with the north wind, dressed in snow besprinkled garments, and full of fun and good cheer. Stepping to the front of the platform, he delivered himself of the following, which was called "Santa Claus' Surprise":

I declare to you, children, on my honor and word,
That I never was so surprised when I heard
Of the glorious, splendid, and beautiful way
In which you are keeping this festal day.

It makes me so glad, and so joyous, and proud,
That, had I the breath, I would shout right out
For it has made my heart ache every year,
you must know,
That I've had so little on the poor to bestow.

So when Mr. Harper asked me to preside,
I made up my mind to let everything slide.
And I hurried so fast to get here in time,
That I'm clean out of breath, and that out of rhyme.

A little bell rang, and Class No. 1, comprising the tots belonging to the primary department, marched to the rostrum and deposited over one hundred toys and oranges. As they marched they sang, their childish voices sending a thrill through the immense congregation:

Here we oranges and toys,
For poor little girls and boys;
Jesus says forgive to-day,
Is like giving gifts to Him.

Again the little bell, and a class of small boys and girls came forward, carrying eighteen pounds of candy and a basket, on which was printed in gilt letters, "In His Name." Class 3, numbering twelve good sized bows dressed as millers, and accompanied by their teacher, Mrs. Burroughs, smiling and happy. They carried [illegible] sacks of meal, which they presented [illegible]

Then came a class with a dozen cans of fruit, followed by a box of little girls bearing pickles and catsup, on which was printed, together with two, three and so on up to fifteen. Of course they were "returns," and Santa received them with a jovial laugh and the words:

"To be continued; our story is sweet.
We promise a thousand fold more
We know that the answer's goodness will

With a most hearty greeting, he announced Class No. 4 was [illegible] by a recitation on "The Happy Dozen," and then the twelve girls came forward bringing, each, a large basket of potatoes and a dozen bananas. They followed themselves, S. S. and all, with cheers, rather [illegible] tea, and boxes, pails of lard and [illegible] packed full to overflowing with pickles, jams and fruit. Class 5, with twelve ladies, dressed as farmers, came in with [illegible] potatoes, turnips, cabbage, and onions. Santa grew excited and stepped about the stage, singing at the top of a very strong voice, suspiciously like Mr. Smith's:

A class of young ladies then presented a large waiter of pies, doughnuts, cookies, and cakes. Then came a lot of young men with sacks of flour on their shoulders, at sight of which Santa again broke forth:

The Bible class then made offerings of groceries, rolls of cloth, ready-made garments and money, and one gentleman attired as a miner, with a miner's candle in his cap, trundled on a barrow of coal, which was to represent three tons donated by the miners and toolboys. This ended the presentation part of the programme, but there followed a splendid concert of song, an admirable address to the scholars, and a stereopticon picture of the Saviour's life, beginning with the worship of the Wise Men of the East, and ending with his triumphant ascension from the top of Mount Olivet. This was followed by Santa Claus as his treat for the children, and most thoroughly did they appreciate it.

Christmas morning the gifts were distributed among a multitude of needy families, and never were there a happier band of children than those at Grace Church Sunday School. They had never had so beautiful a time. As for interest in regard to the good Pilgrim Papa was troubled he was never to be present at the Social. The children all felt that they had been keeping Jesus' birthday.

THE RUSH FOR UNCLE SAM'S FARMS

630,000,000 Fertile Acres Open to Home-seekers

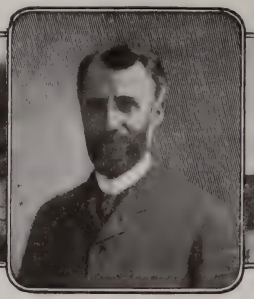
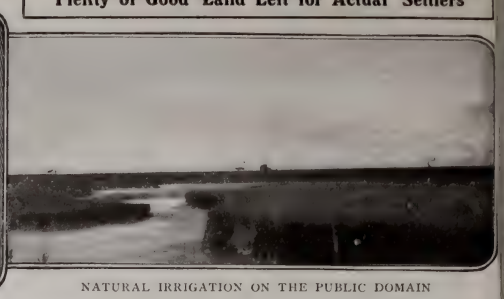
Plenty of Good Land Left for Actual Settlers

HOMESEEKERS LOOKING FOR A SITE





NATURAL IRRIGATION ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN

BEFORE another generation has passed away it is not improbable that the farming area of the United States will have been almost doubled. With improved methods of increasing the growth of wheat, corn, and other products per acre, it is also a thing to be happily considered—the doubling of the yield of the United States.

When it is stated that the farming area of the United States to-day comprises 841,000,000 acres—an area which would embrace England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, France, Germany, Austria, Spain, Japan, and the Transvaal—the enlargment of the farming area, it would seem, might envelop the whole civilized world, or, at least, that portion of it suitable for agricultural purposes.

The earnings of the five and two-thirds million farms of the United States, amounted, in 1903, to almost six billions of dollars—an enormous sum, when it is considered that the total capital of these farm owners is but twenty billions of dollars.

An official report of the United States Geological Survey states that there is still vacant, and open to settlement, an area comprising 630,000,000 acres of good land, or one-third of the entire area of the whole United States. All of this land is either suitable now for agricultural purposes, or can be readily made so by irrigation. Recently, sixteen million dollars was made available by the Government for the immediate reclamation of this property, or a portion of it. Other forces are also moving toward the irrigation of the public lands.

A CAMP OF HOME-SEEKING SQUATTERS WAITING FOR A LAND OPENING

This vacant land is not wholly unutilized, a great portion of it being used for cattle and sheep grazing. In Texas alone, only twenty million of the two hundred and eighty million acres of that vast empire are used for cotton and wheat and truck-farming, the remainder being either vacant or used for the herds. Several ranches of two million acres in extent may be found in the Lone Star State; but these ranches are being cut into smaller tracts and sold. The cattle business, on a large scale, has ceased to pay as it did formerly.

Vacant lands that are used by the sheep and cattle men of the Southwest, are owned by the Government, and the herders use these holdings as free range. The numerous fights that have occurred between cowboys and sheep-herders arose from disputes as to prior possession of this land, although neither had any right to the same. The holders have for years placed a barricade so strong around the free range country in New Mexico, Oklahoma, Arizona, Idaho, Nevada, and elsewhere in the West as to keep away honest settlers—those who would develop the resources of the country; but the Government, with its announced policy of using every available portion of the United States for farming purposes, has declared war upon these sheep and cattle-herders, and is offering every inducement to the legitimate farmer.

There are a number of classes of public domain in the United States, but much of it is not and never will be open to settlement, either free or for consideration. The relative extent of the public domain, as set forth in a recent report of the Government, is as follows:

Vacant public lands,	627,415,680 acres.
Indian reservations,	84,280,960 "
Forest reservations,	19,484,800 "
Lands already disposed of,	708,508,160 "
Area of public domain in Texas owned by the State,	167,865,600 "

The irrigation fund of the United States now made available, will be used in the development of such of these lands as need water, and with the energetic efforts being made by the railroad companies to draw people out of the big cities to the farms, it is probable that in the next few years, settlement of the public domain will be very rapid. Within five years, one-half of this uninhabited domain in New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, etc., will probably be tilled by hardy working men and women.

The rate of disposal of these public lands has not averaged over two per cent. per annum, with the exception of Oklahoma, where there have been frequent land openings and, a great rush of immigrants. But within the past year, the rush to the Southwest has been so great that the rate of settlement has increased twenty per cent. or even more. This is especially true of Oklahoma and the State lands of Texas. More than 600,000,000 acres, or over three-fifths of the entire area of Western vacant land, consists of open, treeless country. Although there is not sufficient moisture to support or encourage the growth of trees upon a greater portion of this area, yet almost everywhere herbage of one kind or another has succeeded in obtaining a foothold, and during a portion of the year it furnishes excellent grazing. The water supply is being brought from inland lakes and creeks to the portions far removed, by means of irrigation ditches.

The desert lands of the United States at present cover over 70,000,000 acres, which, during a portion of the year, can sustain some sort of vegetation, and which may be reclaimed for farming purposes. Great land companies, backed by millions of dollars, are now working upon the construction of irrigation dams, and are arranging for the settlement of millions of acres in Arizona, Nevada, Utah and Wyoming. Of the entire land area, of a number of Western States, an average of only twenty-eight per cent. of the public free land has been settled upon. It is, therefore, readily seen that in almost every State and territory there exist many opportunities for homeseekers. The farmer will find his golden harvest in the public domain of the West and South.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mr. L., Topeka, Kans. "I was in great trouble and He heard me. Glory to his name."

Mrs. J. D. L., Park, Ill. "I prayed until my prayers were answered and a load of sin was taken off my back, such as I never want to bear again. My prayers were answered fully and truly, and I want to take this way of saying to any one in need, that God is a hearer and answerer of prayer."

Reader, Wis. "I believe our Father is a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. I have tried him and found that he does answer. During the past eight months I have been praying for a much-desired thing, and now I have the promise of it, which is just as good as the thing itself."

E. T., Tupperville, N. S. Canada. "We enjoy the answers to prayer. I have had numerous instances of answers to prayer, sometimes almost immediately. I am trusting the Lord for all future blessings. Blessed be his holy name."

S., Carson, Iowa. "God has answered many prayers for me, and I believe and know that he does hear and answer prayer. I have been praying a long time about a great trouble, and now God has answered."

Reader, Conneaut Lake, Pa. "I desire to express my gratitude to God for answering my prayers many, many times in the past. A short time ago, I asked for something very dear to me, to keep as long as my life should last. He has heard me in his loving-kindness."

Reader, Tennessee. "The Lord has answered many prayers for me. I was in great trouble and prayed earnestly for months; he heard and answered, not in the way I was expecting, but, perhaps, in the best way for me. He has answered many other prayers for me. Let all who doubt pray in hope."

Mrs. A. L. E., Sterling, Ill. "I know that God answers prayers. Many times I have had trouble; but I always take it to God in prayer, and my prayers are answered. We must pray for help and He will surely help us."

Frank L., Gilman, Ill. "God has answered my prayers several times. 'Take it to the Lord in prayer'—he will answer."

E. H., Oregon. "I wish to acknowledge the answer to a special prayer not long ago. I do this that others may have faith to ask and receive."

Reader. "I feel that I have so much to be grateful for that I must write, with others, in acknowledging God's goodness. My prayers have been answered many times. It is a sweet privilege to take everything to the Lord in prayer."

M. L. R., Colfax, Iowa. 'Three times my prayers have been so directly answered that I feel in gratitude to my Heavenly Father that my acknowledgment of his goodness ought to be expressed, to help those in doubt of a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. Go to him as a child to its father."

Mrs. S. L. R., Guthrie Center, Iowa. "God has wonderfully answered many prayers for me. A great shadow is over our home, which I am now praying may pass off."

F. M., Pasadena, Cal. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God for answering many of my prayers in my past life. My Christian mother taught me to pray early in life, and the habit of praying with the expectation of being answered, has grown as I have advanced in life. Now, at the age of seventy-seven years, I sometimes feel there is nothing else to do but to ask God and receive the blessing."

Mrs. J. A. E., Eastport, Me. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God to me. He has answered my prayers many times. I will always trust him."

N., New York. "God has answered many prayers of mine. One, recently answered in behalf of a dear daughter, was a cause of much consolation and comfort. Praise his name!"

T. M. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering prayer. I was subjected to a severe trial, but he brought me safely through it in answer to prayer."

THE CHRISTMAS BABY

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"I HAVE never forgotten the day father brought home the Christmas baby."

"Tell us about it, Cousin Ruth."

It was a winter evening, and we were getting ready for Christmas. We Hoberts make a great deal of Christmas, and always garland the house with evergreen, twining ropes of verdure around balusters, and wreathing the chandeliers and pictures, as well as having a big Christmas tree in the front drawing-room. You see, the Hobert connection is very large, and at the holidays we have a real gathering of the clans from far and near. The kith and kin begin to rally about a week before Christmas, and the days that lead up to the best one of all are full of mirth and jollity.

Cousin Ruth Hollister was a dear, elderly, gentlewoman of our blood, but several degrees removed from close relationship. But we adored her, and when, once in a while, she came from Alabama, and joined our holiday circle, our joy was overflowing. Her presence beaded the sparkling cup with delicious foam. She was simply the most entertaining person to have in one's company, vivacious, charming and unaffected, filling the gaps in conversation, and making old and young alike at ease. One never saw her idle. She sat erect in her chair, her hands engaged with fleecy wool work. She was usually knitting white shawls for somebody, and when one was finished she began another immediately. She loved to talk and knit at the same time. It was great luck to have her with us at Christmas.

What would the world do with out the gracious presence of the winsome women, known as old maids? Women sufficiently detached from home cares to be at leisure for other people. Women with rare comprehension and genuine sympathy! To their band belonged Miss Ruth Hollister!

She was never at a loss for a story, and we depended on her for one, not in vain, as we went on, busily weaving and tying our wreathes.

At our urgency, she began her tale, speaking in a low, clear voice that made one think of a brook flowing on softly.

"There were eleven children in the house, for mother had nine of her own; no, Edith, you need not pity her; she was young with her children, and enjoyed them, and the two extra ones were orphan nephews of father's. We had a big rambling house, and plenty to eat and wear, but no frills, no superfluities; we were comfortable and respectable, and never dreamed that we had few luxuries. All of us helped in the work, and the little negroes, of whom there were perhaps eleven more, helped Black Sally and Dinah Gray, their mothers, as cheerfully as we helped our sweet mother. She was queen of the whole domain, house, plantation, and wide estate.

"Father came in one wild, wet Christmas Eve after a long ride. The rain-drops clung to his beard, and glistened on his coat. He was booted and spurred, and he did not, as usual, at once lay off his things and get into slippers, but stood around, hat in hand, as if he were going out again.

"'John, dear, supper's most ready,' said mother. 'You are not too tired to enjoy it, I hope?' she asked, anxiously. 'Did anything go wrong in town. Must there be worry ahead? What ails you, John?'

"'Not a thing, sweetheart. I sold what I took to market and the price is in my pocket. I'm only worrying over a baby I saw down below. I bought all you told me to. I've a hamper full of things.'

"'A baby?' said mother, disregarding the last speech.

"'Yes, sweetheart. The forlornest bit of a baby you ever saw. Its parents were going West. The father was struck with fever, and died last week; and the mother, a fragile little creature, all worn out by hardship and travel and sorrow, passed away this morning. Unless they can find some folks who want that child, he'll have to go to the poor farm. He's a little waif, sure enough, not three months old.'

"'John!' said my mother, severely, 'why did you not bring that child directly to me?'

"'Your hands are overfull, Ellen. There are eleven here now, and the youngest is only four.'

"'What do you know about it, John? I haven't complained. I am raising the whole family pretty well, I think. Where will you find a nicer, prettier, better behaved, more obedient set of children than ours? We're perishing for a baby, and that's the truth. Go straight away to-morrow morning, John, and bring that baby here. I'll feed him, and clothe him, and kiss him, and cuddle him, and spank him when the time comes, exactly as if he were my own. And if nobody claims him, he'll round out our dozen for us, John.'

"Father just shook the rain off his coat, and laughed one of his big hearty laughs. He put his arms around mother and gave her a tremendous hug.

"'You sweetness!' he said. 'You darling! I knew what you'd say. I've got that baby with me. He's in the barn this minute.'

"'In the barn! This cold night! For pity's sake, John, bring him to me.'

"Well," Cousin Ruth, went on, "when mother saw that desolate baby, she cried and cried and cried. He was such a mite, so poor in flesh, like a little old man, with a wizened, three-cornered face, that looked as if it had seen the miseries of a century. Dinah Gray, whose black skin hid the whitest nature that ever a woman had, bathed the 'lile pickaninny' and nursed it at her breast, for she happened to have a baby of her own, and, would you believe it, that child grew into a perfect picture of beauty. Strong and straight and fearless, a sturdy boy on his legs, and the pride and pet of the whole household. We named him Christopher. It seemed a good name for our Christmas child."

JOHN BRINGS IN THE LITTLE CHRISTMAS WAIF

"We had the jolliest Christmas you can imagine that year. Presents for everybody—not one left out—and all of us having just what we wanted most; but the very finest gift of gifts was the baby. From the hour he came things took a turn with us for prosperity. Mother would never say she loved him just as she loved her own, for she was the soul of truth, and her conscience made fine distinctions. But one day she said to me, when she and I were occupied together over some domestic task, 'I wouldn't wonder, Ruth, if I loved Christie a wee bit more than I do the rest of you, for I mix him up in my thought with the Babe who came one night in Judea; the Christ-Child loves my poor Christopher best, I am sure.' Mother was a good woman," added Cousin Ruth.

"She was that," said our mother.

"Did you ever learn anything about his parentage?" inquired Edith.

"Not for some time," said Cousin Ruth. "Chris grew up amongst us, one of our very own, went to school and to college, as my brothers did, and worked on the farm in vacation just as they did. Father and mother treated him like their own flesh and blood. One

How the Browns Spent Saturday Evening

Perhaps it's a good way for you

SATURDAY night had come, and they were just finishing supper, when twenty-one-year-old Emily said, with a groan, "I've had it hanging over me all the week, and I'm not a bit readier for it than I was last Monday. I suppose I ought to have started earlier, but I don't believe it would have made much difference."

"What under the sun is the child talking about?" asked Mrs. Brown, in amazement. "Have you got to have a tooth pulled on Monday, dear?"

"How absurd, mother!" was the answer. "No, it's a good deal worse than a tooth. I've got to teach the Twenty-third Psalm to-morrow in Sunday-school, to a class of sixteen-year-old girls. The Twenty-third Psalm! Just imagine! They all know it by heart—the superintendent has drilled us on it till we could say it backwards."

"Emily! How can you be so irreverent?"

"Oh! I don't intend to, mother dear; but you know what I mean. I honestly think I

"Father Brown looked at his incensed and despairing son and daughter."

ought to give my class up. I don't know enough about the Bible, in the first place, and when it comes to a lesson like this, that is so old and worn out that there's absolutely nothing new I can say to them, what can I do?"

"She's right, Mater," spoke up Rob, "I don't blame you a bit, Sis. If you'll tell me how I'm going to teach that psalm to my class of rowdies, you can have anything I own."

Father Brown laid down the evening paper, and looked amusedly over his spectacles at his incensed and despairing son and daughter. "Have you looked at The Sunday School Times this week?" he threw out tentatively.

"YES, sir, I have," said Emily, "and there's no special help in it that I can use. What I need is some one to give me ideas on how to teach a lesson to my class. There's really no sense in your paying for two copies of the Times, father."

Mr. Brown opened The Sunday School Times and turned its pages. He said nothing, and in a few minutes he closed the paper and joined the rest as they moved out from the dining-room into the library, where they settled down with books and embroidery for the evening.

. . . . . .

"Emily," said Mr. Brown, an hour later, "what should you say is one of the greatest causes of anxiety in this world?"

"Having a Sunday-school class you can't teach."

"Oh, let up on that class, Sis!" interrupted Rob. "I believe fear is one of the worst things to make people anxious, sir," he said to his father.

"That's certainly true of Carrie Smith, in my Sunday-school class," broke in Emily. "She's afraid of everything. If a dog passes her across the street she almost faints. She is afraid of the rest of the girls in the class, and she is afraid in the dark. Really, if the child doesn't overcome it, I don't know what she'll grow into."

"I will fear no evil, for thou art with me," said Mr. Brown, quietly.

"O dad! you're teaching us the Sunday-school lesson," cried Emily, springing up and coming across the room to seat herself on the arm of his chair. "Well, I wish you would teach it to us. There's one good point, anyway, for Carrie Smith, and I certainly never thought of her before in connection with the Twenty-third Psalm."

"YES, sir, I hope you will," said Rob. "I can use that point, too. I've got two youngsters in my class that need it. One of 'em is a little coward physically; the other is so over-conscientious he is always borrowing trouble for to-morrow, and afraid that he's going to yield to some awful sin. If he'd stop 'fearing evil' and trust the Lord a little, he'd accomplish a heap more."

"Well, do you think of any other cause of anxiety in the world?" said Father Brown, slipping his arm around the waist of the big daughter at his side.

"Want," said Emily promptly. "There is a positive bitterness in some of my girls toward the whole world because they are in more or less want a good deal of the time."

"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want,'" quoted Mr. Brown again.

"Why, it's there—isn't it?" said Emily delightedly. "And those very girls are members of the church, too. I don't believe they ever stopped to realize that it is positively wrong for them to be embittered and anxious because they don't have all they would like. I know they never thought of it in connection with the Twenty-third Psalm they repeat so glibly. Father, do go on. I really believe I can teach that lesson."

"I wonder if your girls realize that even if they had all they want they wouldn't be contented without the spirit of the beautiful old Shepherd Psalm," said Mr. Brown. "Turn to the second chapter of Ecclesiastes, and read from the fourth to the eleventh verse, Emily."

"What a crushing climax!" said Emily after a moment, when she had read the passage to herself.

"Let's see it," said Rob, reaching for the Bible.

"And it's just what Sadie Henderson needs, too," Emily went on. "If there ever was a pampered 'lap-of-luxury' girl, it's Sadie. But she's awfully discontented. She needs a dose of Ecclesiastes followed by the Twenty-third Psalm."

"If you want a contrast, Emily, look at Paul's experience as he tells about it in 2 Corinthians, from the twenty-third to the twenty-seventh verse of the eleventh chapter. In spite of those terrible persecutions, Paul had a secret that kept him absolutely content. He confided it to the Philippians, when he wrote them, and you'll find it in the eleventh verse of the last chapter of that letter. Years before, David had the same secret: 'The Lord is my shepherd.' Isn't it beautiful?"

"Beautiful? Why, father, I never knew that psalm was so interesting before, and that it had so much to do with the rest of the Bible. But I believe you know the whole Bible by heart. I wish I could turn to all the interesting places the way you can."

MR. BROWN smiled across at Mrs. Brown. "There's an interesting story told of a remarkable ruler who lived in Northern Syria during the first half of the nineteenth century, Prince B'Sheer," he went on, "that throws a little light on the old familiar verse: 'Yea,

"How much would a dinner like that cost?"

though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.' One of the officers of Prince B'Sheer once unexpectedly met a woman traveling alone in the 'Valley of the Horn,' a proverbial robbers' haunt. The astonished officer asked the woman, 'Where is thy escort?' 'My escort,' she replied, 'is in Beit ed-Deen [the residence of B'Sheer, a hundred miles away]. His rod protects me, even in Wady el-Karn.' And she was as safe as though she had had an armed troop accompanying her."

"I can use that in my class," said Rob interestedly. "Tell us some more, father."

"I wonder if the boys and girls in your classes realize how many good things in life God has all ready and waiting for them, if they will only trust him and accept them," said the father. "If they don't, try this illustration:

"'A man had engaged passage on a coasting steamer bound for Florida. He was in straitened circumstances, and had but a small sum left when his ticket was paid for. Part of this he invested in crackers and cheese, thinking the cabin fare much too expensive for his limited means. After a while his crackers tasted flat and stale, and his cheese became hard and mouldy. To aggravate matters, he was obliged, three times a day, to inhale the odors from the cook's galleys, and the delicious aromas drove him almost frantic. Finally, when within a day's sail from the port of destination, he grew desperate. Seeing the steward bearing a huge platter with a turkey and fixings, he waylaid him at the entrance of the dining-saloon, and said: 'See here! I haven't much money, but I have stood this thing as long as I can. How much will a dinner like that cost?' 'Cost!' exclaimed the steward, 'why, man, it don't cost you anything! it's all paid for in your passage.'"

"That's a mighty good illustration," said Rob, as his father finished; "you're a genius at finding or remembering that sort of thing, sir. I've got no knack at it at all."

"Don't let your boys forget one thing though, Rob," said his father. "The 'I shall not want' does not belong to the 'I will not work.'"

Rob had out his note-book by this time.

"Does any one know when the Twenty-third Psalm was written?" Emily asked.

"Not absolutely," her father said. "If we assume that David wrote it, we must assign it to a time in his life when his enemies were strong, and after he had become especially interested in the 'house of Jehovah.' In this case, perhaps 1023 Before Christ, or 972 Before Christ, by the Assyrian chronology as now commonly understood, would be the time of its writing."

"JUST see how many teaching points there are in the Psalm," went on Mr. Brown. "Take these half-dozen, for instance, and see how easily you can work them up, and apply them to your two classes. There's the life of faith, the life of peace, the life of God's guidance, the life of comfort in trial, the life of triumph (that's one for your boys, Rob), and the promise of a life with God forever."

"Why, father, that's the lesson in a nutshell," burst out Emily admiringly. "If only I could do it! You always make a lesson seem so easy. Now, if The Sunday School Times had anything in it like what you've given us to-night, I'd gladly pay five dollars a year for it, instead of the dollar that it costs."

Father Brown's eyes began to twinkle. He looked across the library table at Mother Brown, who was smiling, then he threw back his head and gave a hearty laugh.

"Father, you're making fun of us," said Emily, "What is the joke?"

"There's no joke, Emily dear," said Father Brown, seriously again; "but there's a secret. Where do you suppose I got all these facts and points and dates and references and illustrations I've been giving you?"

"Why, out of your head and memory, sir," said Rob.

"No; out of a little treasure-box I've got behind me." And Mr. Brown reached back of his chair and lifted up the copy of the Sunday School Times that he had tossed there.

"FATHER BROWN, I just don't believe you," said Emily, snatching the paper out of his hand.

"Do you remember I asked you at supper whether you had studied the Times on this lesson, Emily?"

"Yes, sir"—a little sheepishly. "But I didn't know it had that sort of help in it."

"Had you read Doctor Dunning's hints for the 'Intermediate Teacher?'" asked her father.

"That's under the 'Graded Helps'—isn't it? No, our school isn't graded, you know, and, besides, my class wouldn't be in the intermediate department if it were."

"But didn't you know that the 'Graded Helps' in the Times are just as valuable for classes in an ungraded school as in a graded school? And Doctor Dunning's article is one of the best all-round teaching helps I know of," said her father. "Teachers of scholars running from ten to twenty years of age can find lots of practical help in it. Probably that's why the editors have changed the title of the article, as I see by this issue, to 'The Young Folks' Class.'"

"What made you think of asking us what causes anxiety, sir?" said Rob. "It's such a good way of opening up the lesson that I think I'll begin that way to-morrow."

"Afraid he's going to yield to some awful sin."

"Look at the first sentence of Doctor Dunning's article," answered his father.

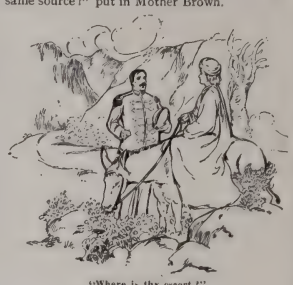
"AND where did you get those tremendously apt references from Ecclesiastes and Paul's letters?" asked Emily.

"Look at Doctor Dunning," said Mr. Brown with a smile. "But I used only about one-fifth of his article. If you like the sample, why not try more of it yourselves next time?

"Well, sir, how about that rattling good illustration of the fellow starving himself on shipboard?" Rob asked.

"Oh! that's from Doctor Banks's column of illustrations, of course. I've somehow got into the habit of turning to him first of all when I open the paper. I'm pretty sure to find one or two that just 'hit' me, and a good illustration is often a whole lesson in itself."

"Was the story of the Syrian prince from the same source?" put in Mother Brown.



"Where is thy escort?"

"No, dear; that was from Mrs. Howie's 'Oriental Lesson-Lights.' I always feel as if I'd had a little visit to the Holy Land when I read her. She lives on Mt. Lebanon, you know, and sends her articles fresh from Syria."

"WHAT made you think of that clever thing I'm going to tell my boys to paste in their hats, father?"

"What do you mean?" asked his father curiously.

"Why,"—and Rob pulled out his note-book—"'The I shall not want does not belong to the I will not work.'"

"Did you never notice those little italic sentences interjected between the longer lesson articles, Rob? 'Epigrams,' I call them."

"I never stopped to read them, sir. But if that's what they're like, I'll keep a sharp eye on them. I believe I could get a motto a week from them for my boys."

"And when you asked me when the Twenty-third Psalm was written, Emily, I quoted Professor Beecher. Beecher on the Old Testament, and Riddle on the New, tell you all you want to know about time and place and persons, and clear up puzzling passages in the text," Mr. Brown said.

"Why didn't I know it was all there before?" said Emily. "Why, father dear, I'm fairly impatient to get to my class. I'm positively enthusiastic. Do you think I could study next week's lesson myself out of The Sunday School Times, and get anything like as much out of it?"

"INDEED you can, Emily, and a great deal more. I only touched on a very few points to-night. For downright practical applications of the lesson to your boys and girls, and to grown folks, too, I don't know of anything that compares with Doctor Goss's 'Lesson in Everyday Life.' Those six points that you said gave the lesson in a nutshell, were Doctor Hurlbut's 'Lesson Outline.' If I were a superintendent, I should load up with the bright suggestions of Doctor Schauffler in his 'Hints for the Superintendent.' Mother was scheduled to teach the Primary Union this afternoon, and I suppose that's why I found Mrs. Bryner's 'Primary Teacher' article so well thumbed and marked."

"What writer do you like best of all, father?" asked Rob.

"I could no more decide between them than I could between you and Emily," came the smiling answer. "But, whoever else I study, I always come back to the grand old preacher, McLaren of Manchester, for the precious truths of the lesson put so beautifully, so clearly, and so strongly, that it's like listening to a sermon in Westminster Abbey. And now, children, you must excuse me, for I've got to put some finishing touches on my study of Dean Sanders' Senior Bible Class article for my adult class to-morrow. I've been at it all the week, but I'm not through yet. The class has doubled since I got them all to take the Times and study his outlines themselves, and as for interest—well, they simply all want to talk at once."

"All right, father dear, but where's that other copy of this wonderful old paper? Rob and I can use it together to-night; but—Say, dad, I think you'd better order four copies after this."

"Why not make it five, Sis, and get the seventy-five cent club rate, instead of the dollar? We can give our extra copy to the minister." And Rob was at his desk addressing an envelope to The Sunday School Times Co., Walnut and Eleventh Sts., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

THERE was silence after the question. It was broken by Mrs. Vernon, who turned and faced the women.

"We do not need to give up praying for these men, even if we do not pray here on the walk in front of their places. Is God restricted in his Almighty power to answer whether we pray in one place or another? Let us pray at home and in our churches and at our daily work. God is not dead. He will hear and answer our righteous prayers."

"That's right," Mrs. Edwards vigorously seconded Mrs. Vernon. "Let's go home and do our praying as we work."

The women went home that afternoon, but it was a long time before Colby forgot that stirring afternoon in front of Jake Lawson's. If a saloon-keeper can lose caste, he lost it from that date. Even the men who continued to frequent his bar had a contempt for him, and showed it in many ways.

But there was one man in Colby who brooded over the event of the afternoon until it finally led to one of the strangest acts in the history of the temperance movement in Anderson. The man was Quits, and he broke a long silence one afternoon about two weeks after the affair with Jake Lawson, by saying to George:

"The thing that makes me mad is the fact that Jake Lawson never heard the prayers of the women. He didn't dare listen to them. That's the case with all the saloon men and brewers. They never hear any prayers. And they don't dare to listen. I don't believe any living man could listen to Mother Vernon's prayers or to Mrs. Edwards or Mrs. Douglas, and then go right on selling liquor."

"You're wrong there, Quits. I don't believe anything could have any effect on Lawson."

"I'd like to try him and see," replied Quits, in a strange tone.

"What do you mean?" asked George, in astonishment.

"If I work out my idea will you help?" asked Quits, looking at George doubtfully.

"Of course I will," replied George promptly. George had shot up during the last three years to a somewhat awkward but quite stout and well-developed youth, and Quits had good reasons for wanting to keep friendly with him and retain his influence and intimacy, up to this time unimpaired.

"I'll tell you when I'm ready," Quits said briefly, and George forgot all about it the next day.

A week later, Quits invited George to supper with him, and after the meal he told of his plan and asked George's help. There was no work to do at the Beacon office that night, and the evening was before them.

George listened to the plan proposed by Quits, and when he was through, the boy stared at him with amazement.

"You're crazy, Quits!"

"No, I'm not," replied Quits, doggedly. "It can be done and the risk is not very great. I've taken bigger ones many times riding on the bogies of the through express. If you don't want to go into it, I'll try it alone."

"No, I'll go with you. But what if he gets the drop on us?"

"He won't," Quits said shortly. "I've known Jake Lawson longer than you have. He's one of the biggest cowards in Anderson county. There's no danger to us."

When Quits and George started out from the boarding-house it was nearly eight o'clock. The night was warm, and the Methodist Church bell was ringing for the special prayer-meeting which the temperance women of Colby had established for Wednesday night every week since their attempt to hold their service in front of the saloons.

Quits carried on his arm a blanket, and he gave to George a coil of small rope. They walked along one of the streets parallel to the main street, until they were a block above Jake's place, then crossed over the main thoroughfare into the alley that ran past the rear of the saloon. Half a block from the rear of the saloon Quits stopped and listened. The rumble of a heavy wagon at the farther end of the alley seemed to assure him.

"He'll be out in a minute," he muttered, and motioned George to come along. Together they went down the alley until they were standing in the shadow of the short platform at the rear of the saloon, where Jake put out his empty kegs for the beer wagon to collect.

Evidently Quits had studied the entire detail of his plan with a nicety and precision that George could not help admiring, although his young heart was beating a tattoo on his ribs, and if truth were told he would have run away if Quits had not laid a heavy hand on his arm.

For three weeks there had been a strike among the teamsters in Colby and Clinton. The Clinton men had combined against the saloon men in Colby for less night work. The Colby saloon men had fought the demand and pressed into service every team they could get. There was, however, great irregularity of delivery. Quits must have noticed, with a strategist's keenness for minute detail the time that elapsed between the entrance of the delivery beer wagon into the alley four blocks away, where the first saloon was located, and the time it generally took to reach Jake's place. At any rate, he reasoned that the chances were good that at some time during the early evening Jake would come out of the rear door of the saloon upon the platform to roll out empty kegs or listen for the approach of the wagon, since that was the regular time for receiving a fresh supply of liquor from Clinton.

He climbed quietly upon the platform, and stood close by the door with his back against the building, and motioned to George to come up and stand beside him. There was just room for them both. The door was partly open, and they could hear the clinking of glasses at the bar and the sound of voices.

"Do you want the rope now?" whispered George, his teeth chattering a little.

"No, but have it ready. Do just as I told you. Keep still. He's coming."

There was a step along the passageway and the door was opened. Jake came out, and, glancing up the alley, muttered an oath at the striking teamsters and the late delivery.

The next instant Quits had thrown his blanket over the saloon-keeper's head, twisted the ends of the blanket tightly around the back of his neck, and thrown his long, powerful arms about his body.

Lawson was not a very large man, and by the side of Quits he was hardly a match even for George. But after the first shock of surprise he tried to cry out through the folds of the blanket, and began to kick at Quits vigorously.

Quits lifted him off his feet, dropped him over the edge of the platform and threw him down at full length, kneeling on Lawson's legs, and then, before the saloon-keeper could recover from his second shock, he raised his body up from the ground and pinioned his arms to his sides with the help of George, who, now that the first fright was over, entered into the spirit of Quit's strange adventure with the delight of a rapidly awakening desire for excitement of the unusual sort.

"Take hold of his legs now, George," said Quits, as he lifted Lawson's body,

"THE AMERICAN BOY," the greatest boys' magazine in the world, shows a boy what he can do, tells him what other boys are doing. Its influence is all for good, turns his mind in the right channels, backs up what he learns at school, gives him new ideas, inspirations and encouragement. It appeals to the fun and sport loving side of his nature, and it teaches him to turn his head and hands to account in providing his own pleasure and profit.

The American Boy

is the best Christmas present for any boy—it lasts a whole year and will give him more solid satisfaction and enjoyment than any article you might select at ten times the cost. The hours spent in reading healthy stories of sport, travel and achievement, and instructive tales of history will make a lasting impression on life. Three months free if you subscribe now.

15 Months $1.00

we will send "The American Boy" for the entire year of 1904 and furnish the October, November and December issues in 1903 FREE. Everyone subscribing now will receive a free copy of the greatest boy picture ever painted by Adam Emery Albright, the famous artist of American child life. This, his latest work, is entitled "On the Village Green," showing two boys in the attitude of batter and catcher at base ball. It is sure to be a striking and favorite ornament for a boy's room. THE NARROW GATE and together they carried him up the alley for a block and a half, and then laid him down again.

Lawson seemed stunned into silence during the time he was being carried, but as soon as Quits and George laid him down he made an effort to get up, and struggled furiously to loosen his arms, which were pinned close to his body with the rope. Quits pushed him back, and, kneeling close to him, he spoke in a low, but distinct voice.

"Jake Lawson, do you know me?"

The saloon-keeper made no answer, and Quits bent closer and spoke a name that George could not hear. Jake Lawson heard, however, and the few words that Quits added to the name evidently had an astonishing effect in quieting him. Out of what dark past the once reckless, dissipated printer had drawn some Christ-forgiven wrong with which Quits and Lawson were intimate, and for his share of which Quits felt pardon, George never knew. Apparently the saloon-keeper regarded Quits now with apprehension. Nothing short of some deep-seated dread of a past, he thought unshared by others, could account for what now took place. "Get up," Quits said briefly, and as he rose, he helped Lawson to his feet.

For a moment the three stood together, George and Quits each side of Lawson. Then Quits said, "Will you go along quietly without making any trouble now?"

After a second's hesitation, the saloon-keeper nodded his head. Quits took off the blanket and said, "Come along, then."

They went up the alley another block, and then turned and came out on the main street close by the Methodist Church. As they crossed over and went into the entrance that led by the chapel of the church, George, looking carefully at Lawson's face, will never forget the curious mingling of fear, apprehension, and hatred that convulsed his features.

The prayer-meeting had begun, and the women were singing a hymn as Quits motioned George to guide the saloon-keeper on his side around the chapel, until they came out at the rear of the building. The night was warm and a window at the corner was open. Quits halted near this window, and with a remarkable smile on his homely face, he pulled Jake Lawson up close to the building. Lawson's face was a study, as he dimly began to have some sense of Quits' motive.

The hymn ceased, and there was a period of intense stillness. It was suddenly broken by a voice praying. At first, the words were not audible to the listeners outside; but soon the sentences came clear and distinct.

"Dear Lord, have mercy upon the boys in this town. Many of them are going down to ruin. What can we do, O Lord, but pray and beseech thee to hear us, not for ourselves, but for those who are being lost. So many years, Lord Jesus! O Lord, we, thy children, have pleaded with thee to save our boys. O God!" The voice broke with a sob, and a trembling voice said "Amen! O Lord, hear us!" Then the prayer went on: "And we pray also, dear Father, for the men in Colby who are breaking the laws, and are engaged in the rum business for gain. O God, especially we pray thee send thy convicting spirit upon Jake Lawson, and break his heart of stone. Save his soul, O God, for the sake of Christ!" (All over the room were cries of "Amen! Yes, Lord! O hear us!") "He has sinned deeply these many years. But thy grace is sufficient for any one. O we beg of thee, move with thy power upon all the saloon-keepers in this town, and convict them of sin and save them! The politicians care not for the welfare of our homes, and our boys are going down to death, and no one but thyself to save. O God, hear us. We believe in thee. Thou art the hope of our souls. O save us from despair, and shine upon us with the light of thy redemptive countenance. For the sake of Jesus Christ, who died on the shameful Cross, have mercy upon us and grant us deliverance. Convict sinners of sin and deliver us from evil. For thine is the Kingdom forever. In Jesus' name. Amen."

Jake Lawson made a movement as if to get away. Quits laid his long, heavy hand on the man's shoulder, and he stopped. But Quits felt him trembling.

There were two more prayers, in each of which Lawson's name was mentioned specially. Then a quavering voice began, "Rescue the perishing!" Sobs and cries broke into the singing, and the minute it was finished the prayers began again. Some of them were almost hysterical in their despairing energy. Most of them were spoken by wives and mothers who had felt the iron enter their own souls, in home desolations that could not be revealed to any one but God. All of them, without exception, pleaded for the conversion of the saloon-keepers of Colby, and for Jake Lawson in particular. As the prayer meeting drew to a close, Quits' face expressed a grim satisfaction. When the leader gave out the closing hymn, Quits drew Lawson around the other corner of the chapel and cut the rope that had bound him.

"You've heard some prayers for once in your life, Jake Lawson, and I hope they may do you good. Before you go, I want you to know that I don't have any hatred towards you. You did me a great wrong once, that time——" Quits' face worked strangely. "But you didn't know I was in it. I've forgiven you, and I don't bear any grudge. But you need to get on your knees, Jake, and cry aloud. A man that's had so many prayers offered for him as you have ought to be saved. You know you're a sinner, Jake Lawson. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, my brother, and he will save you, as he has saved me. Will you?"

FOR CHILLY PEOPLE.

A New Kind of Underwear that Protects the Body in a Helpful Way.

Chilly people, who seldom enjoy bodily warmth and glow from fall till early spring, will be interested to learn of a wonderful invention—a new kind of underwear of peculiar texture—that promises to put an end to their physical discomforts. It is called Utica Ribbed Fleece, and is having unusual sales in the stores this winter. Its low price is no less remarkable than its singular quality.

Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear is knitted to protect the body in a new way. On one side is an elastic rib, and on the other a glossy fleece forming one fabric. This fleece supplies warmth which rarely becomes too great during violent exercise, because the heat is regulated by the movement of the elastic rib. After exercise this same movement prevents the heat escaping too rapidly, and chills and colds are almost impossible.

Its elasticity makes it very flexible, and easily adapted to every motion of the body. For this reason it will be appreciated by men whose occupations require constant stooping and physical movement. Women find that this elastic quality makes the Utica Ribbed Fleece garments very desirable.

Men who wear these garments say that they are better than those for which they have been accustomed to pay a much higher price. Both men's and women's wear are sold at fifty cents for each garment.

Mothers will find that the Children's garments—pants and vests and union suits—are strongly made, hygienic and sensible. All boys', girls' and children's sizes are sold at twenty-five cents the separate garment, and fifty cents the union suit.

UTICA RIBBED FLEECE

Under the trade mark, Utica Ribbed Fleece, these goods are sold everywhere. They are manufactured by the Utica Knitting Company.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

CHRISTMAS IN THE TENEMENTS*

IN a hundred places all over the city, when Christmas comes, as many open-air fairs spring suddenly into life. A kind of Gentile Feast of Tabernacles possesses the tenement districts especially. Green-embowered booths stand in rows at the curb, and the voice of the tin trumpet is heard in the land. The common source of all the show is down by the North River, in the district known as "the Farm." Down there Santa Claus establishes headquarters early in December and until past New Year. The broad quay looks then more like a clearing in a pine forest than a busy section of the metropolis. The steamers discharge their loads of fir trees at the piers until they stand stacked mountain-high, with foot-hills of holly and ground-ivy trailing off toward the land side. An army train of wagons is engaged in carting them away from early morning till late at night; but the green forest grows, in spite of it all, until in places it shuts the shipping out of sight altogether. The air is redolent with the smell of balsam and pine.

Into the ugliest tenement street Christmas brings something of picturesqueness, of cheer. Its message was ever to the poor and the heavy-laden, and by them it is understood with an instinctive yearning to do it honor. In the stiff dignity of the brownstone streets up-town there may be scarce a hint of it. In the homes of the poor it blossoms on stoop and fire-escape, looks out of the front window, and makes the unsightly barber-pole to sprout overnight like an Aaron's-rod. Poor indeed is the home that has not its sign of peace over the hearth, be it but a single sprig of green. A little color creeps with it even into rabbinical Hester street, and shows in the shop-windows and in the children's faces. The very feather dusters in the pedler's stock take on brighter hues for the occasion, and the big knives in the cutler's shop gleam with a lively anticipation of the impending goose "with fixins"—a concession, perhaps, to the commercial rather than the religious holiday; business comes then, if ever. A crowd of ragamuffins camp out at a window where Santa Claus and his wife stand in state, embodiment of the domestic ideal that has not yet gone out of fashion in these tenements, gazing hungrily at the announcement that "A silver present will be given to every purchaser by a real Santa Claus—M. Levitsky."

Farthest down town, where the island narrows toward the Battery, and warehouses crowd the few remaining tenements, the sombre-hued colony of Syrians is astir with preparation for the holiday. How comes it that in the only settlement of the real Christmas people in New York the corner saloon appropriates to itself all the outward signs of it? Even the floral cross that is nailed over the door of the Orthodox church is long withered and dead; it has been there since Easter, and it is yet twelve days to Christmas by the belated reckoning of the Greek Church. But if the houses show no sign of the holiday, within there is nothing lacking. The whole colony is gone a-visiting. There are enough of the unorthodox to set the fashion, and the rest follow the custom of the country. The men go from house to house, laugh, shake hands, and kiss one another on both cheeks, with the salutation, "Kol am va antom Salimoon." "Every year and you are safe," the Syrian guide renders it into English; and a non-professional interpreter amends it: "May you grow happier year by year."

The bells in old Trinity chime the midnight hour. . . . . Outside the snow is falling. It sifts silently into each nook and corner, softens all the hard and ugly lines, and throws the spotless mantle of charity over the blemishes, the shortcomings. Christmas morning will dawn pure and white.

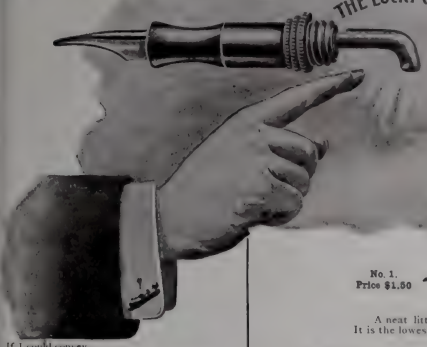
LUCKY CURVE

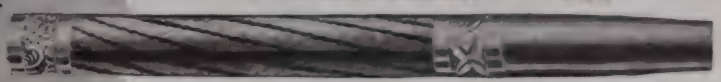
A Christmas Suggestion

LUCKY CURVE

The "Lucky Curve" is a scientific improvement which, by its peculiar construction, not only feeds the ink perfectly from the barrel to the pen, but prevents the ink from leaking and getting over the outside of the nozzle to soil the fingers when next used. My little booklet, "The Reason Why," tells all.

The GEO. S. PARKER Fountain Pen





A Christmas Suggestion

Are you perplexed and bothered to know what to select for a Christmas present for some dear friend, for gentleman, lady or girl, for a young lady or young gentleman, for mother, father, sister, or brother? There is no present of moderate price which you can buy that will give anything like such pleasure and satisfaction as will a Parker Pen. It is a useful article, which will last a lifetime and be a constant pleasure to the owner. For your convenience, I will illustrate a few of the most popular numbers My catalogue, however, shows many additional styles.

No. 1. Price $1.50

No. 1. Plain Barrel Parker Lucky Curve. Price $1.50.

A neat little pen. Has the "Lucky Curve" Screw Joint. Does not have the Anti-Break Cap. Either over or under Feed. A very good pen and guaranteed. It is the lowest in price of any Parker "Lucky Curve" made.

No. 20. Screw Joint or Jointless $3.00

This is a splendid pen for the money, and it is just the thing for the school boy or school girl. It is a good, solid, serviceable pen, and will stand lots of hard usage. If you want to send a thrill of pleasure through "that boy" or "that girl," you can do it with a Parker No. 20. Not quite so large as the next one, but a good and fully warranted.

No. 23. This number can be supplied when so desired, with practically same size barrel as No. 20, but the pen is a full size larger than the preceding number. The larger pen affording, as it does, the different "feel," will richly repay anyone to purchase this pen if they are conservative. Price $4.00.

No. 24. Screw Joint or Jointless $4.00

No. 24. Price $4.00. This pen is much larger than the general run of pens, and they are purchased by those who know and who they want and can afford to pay the higher price necessary for the larger and better pen. If you feel like spending $4.00 for a fountain pen, and purchase this pen, we feel safe in saying you can choose $10.00 around and not find a better pen if another could not be purchased. It has a "feel," too, all its own. We can recommend it as one of the finest pens ever made. (This pen fitted for shorthand, bookkeeping or Bookkeeping when so ordered.)

No. 25. Screw Joint or Jointless $5.00

No. 25. Price $5.00. If you enjoy writing with a large fountain and pen, you should own a No. 25. It will tell the story of what real luxury is possible to be afforded by a fountain pen. The entire fountain is large, but you forget all about that, as the large, smooth shining pen glides swiftly over the paper.

No. 6. Price $3.00

This is a very handsome pen. Has beautifully chased barrel in a great variety of patterns, fitted with gold bands. It is made [illegible] in engraving, the other, ladies' size, considerably smaller.

No. 9. Price $4.00

This is a gentlemen's pen exclusively. It is by all odds the most handsome of the large sized fountains. An ample ink reservoir, beautifully ornamented. A superb pen in every way. For a birthday or holiday gift it is simply ideal.

No. 12. Price $6.00

No. 12. Inlaid pearl with gold bands. Price $6.00. If you want to own something out of the ordinary, or make a present that [illegible] no further. The price quoted on all pens are with plain boxes.

No. 14. Price $5.00

No. 16. Price $6.00

The Silver is inlaid over the vulcanite, making a most striking looking pen. Spoon is covered in some [illegible] 18K gold plate will wear for many years. Price $6.00. If you want to spend as much as $5 to $[illegible]

No. 30 Price $10.00

Ten dollars is a good deal of money to pay for a fountain pen, but if [illegible] ten dollar pen. We discovered something we did not know before, and that is, [illegible] want. We sold more than ten times as many of these high priced pens as we [illegible] rich-looking, gold-covered No. 30. If you want to make some dear friend [illegible] will fill the bill. For presentation purposes to some office or [illegible] barrel in place provided to engrave name, [illegible]

No. 40. Price $20.00

No. 40. Price $20.00.

We do not expect this pen will ever come into [illegible] of a society, it would make a lasting reminder of the donor. It is difficult [illegible] representation of it. The flowers, leaves, vines, etc., stand out in relief as the hand of the engraver has left them. The delicate beauty and richness of this pen must be seen to be appreciated. Sample pen will be sent a push mailer, post with at address and charge.

Bulldog Special. Price $4.00

This is a new thing in fountain pens. It [illegible] vantage of never getting lost, always at hand, and [illegible] two years and seems destined to be a great success [illegible] charmed circles. A specimen pen [illegible]

Let me send you my catalogue, which is very complete in the way of [illegible] Reason Why," as well as the name of a local dealer who sells the "Lucky Curve." I want you [illegible] day and permit me to send you the information and catalogue I have waiting for you.

Geo. S. Parker, 16 Mill Street, Janesville, Wis., U. S. A.

P. S. If you will state in your letter that you are an INTENDING PURCHASER of a Parker Pen, I will send you complimentary a 6-inch Aluminum Rule and Paper Cutter, on receipt of stamp; to others, 12 cents.

Absolutely the Best Pen in the World

Honest pens that will wear, and capable of many years of satisfactory use. In fact, I issue an Accident Policy with each pen, which not only guarantees each pen to be entirely satisfactory, but it Insures Against Breakage for One Year Cap, Barrel, Feeder, Nozzle, and, in fact, any part except the Gold Pen.

Such vital and necessary patented improvements as the famous "Lucky Curve" feed, the Anti-Break Cap, Spring Lock, etc., are some reasons for its great superiority, and without which they could not be claimed to be Perfect Parker Pens.

To those who have never owned a Fountain Pen, the Parker is a delight. To those who have tried others, it is perfection. First right in principle, then skillfully made to avoid the weak points found in other makes. Parker Pens seem to go alone, so smooth and easy is their movement.

Many thousands of the best dealers sell my pens and carry fine assortments. If, however, you cannot purchase a Parker Pen in your city, please do not purchase another make simply to accommodate the dealer, by enabling him to make a larger profit than he could by selling you a "Lucky Curve," but in such an instance kindly order direct.

Remember, in purchasing the Parker you are buying a pen not merely for to-day or to-morrow, but one that will last many years, consequently you cannot afford to be annoyed by the use of an inferior pen.

May I ask, in event I have the pleasure of numbering you among the users of the Parker Pen, and you find I have given you better value than I promised, will you kindly speak a good word in its behalf to your friends? If you do, I will appreciate it as a personal favor.

For Booklovers. — Pencil notes will blur. A "Parker Pen" will make them indelible.

For Statesmen. — Keep talon on your opponent's speech. A "Parker Pen" is ready on the instant.

For Students. Ever find your pencil notes blurred? Use a "Parker Pen" and avoid this annoyance.

For the Foreman and Superintendent. — A practical pen for practical men. The "Parker Pen" uses any color ink — writes neatly — does not stick or splutter.

For Cashier. — Twice as many checks can be signed — if you use a "Parker Pen" — ready without a shake.

For Physicians. — Use it for writing prescriptions, making original and duplicate copies, one for patient, the other for files.

For Stenographers. — The stenographers third-hand, lectures and sermons always readable when you get home.

For Travelers. — Useful as time tables. A traveler can write out his orders on the double-quick with a "Parker Pen."

For Bill Clerk. — Saves one man's work in invoicing. Can make original copy for customers, carbon copy for file, all done with one writing — with a "Parker Pen."

For Reporters. — The Reporter's Side Arm. — The "Parker Pen" is always ready to make notes.

For Ministers. — Do not attempt to hold those fleeting thoughts in your head. A "Parker Pen" will transfer them to paper at your command.

For Social or Business Correspondence. — Indispensable.

Who sells them? More than 9000 of the best dealers!

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE.

Price $5.00, which includes thermometer, which is accompanied by a certified certificate showing correct readings of the thermometer.

Ivers & Pond PIANOS.

May we send you our new catalogue and explain our method for supplying purchasers with our pianos easily, safely, and to their advantage wherever they may live? If we have no dealer in your vicinity we will, at your request, ship any style of upright or grand piano that we make, to be tried in your home before you decide to purchase, not to be retained unless entirely satisfactory, we paying all railway freights if it fails to please you in any way.

EASY PAYMENTS.

We sell on easy payments in the most remote city or village of the United States as conveniently as in Boston, requiring but a small cash payment, balance in 12, 24 or 36 equal monthly payments, practically renting the piano till it is paid for. Ivers & Pond Pianos are of but one grade, the highest, and excel in tone quality, durability and tune-staying properties. Old pianos taken in exchange. Your name and valuable information will be sent free. We may save you $50 or $100 in the purchase of a piano. We can certainly save you all chances of getting an inferior instrument.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Subscriber, Pulaski, N. Y. If a husband obtains divorce from his wife, and she has no bill of divorcement from him, can he legally come in possession of any portion of her property? Are the laws of all States alike in this?

If a husband obtains an absolute divorce from his wife in the State of New York, his marital rights in his wife's property cease. This is the general rule, but the laws of the different States vary so much, that an opinion from a local lawyer would be necessary to settle the question as to a particular State.

W. M. H., Lidgerwood, N. D. Is there not a discrepancy between the accounts of Mark and John about the time of the crucifixion? Mark puts it at the third hour; John says it was about the sixth.

There is some dispute as to the harmonizing of the two accounts. The most probable explanation is that John reckoned the hours from midnight as we do, while Mark reckoned according to the Jewish custom from six o'clock, which would make it nine when the crucifixion took place. John's reckoning, you will observe, was of the time that Jesus was before Pilate, and the subsequent proceedings and the procession to Calvary might easily fill three hours.

DR. KLOPSCH—Dear Sir: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S premium, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, received in good condition, and all right, for which I wish to thank you. I am more than pleased; I am delighted with it; especially with the clear type and the pretty binding. The book is better than I expected, containing more reading and the nice illustrations. I never have seen a copy like it. Again I heartily thank you.
Waltham, Mass. ABBIE A. SMITH.

Ruth C. H., Chicago. It was said to me the other day, that persons who drink live longer than those who do not. Can you give statistics to the contrary?

The statement cannot be maintained. All the evidence goes to prove indisputably that the drinker is the shorter lived. Dr. A. Baer, of the Imperial Health Board of Germany, Berlin's chief physician, says the drinker dies sooner than the non-drinker. The greater mortality of drinkers as compared with non-drinkers is shown in these figures of the British United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Association: For the whole period from 1866 to 1887, inclusive, the comparative death-rate was—abstainers 2,798, as against drinkers 5,984. In the Total Abstainers division, 71 per cent. of the "expected deaths" occurred and in the non-abstainers 97 per cent. of the "expected deaths," proving the disease-resisting power of the abstainer. Our American actuaries place the death-rate among even moderate drinkers 33 per cent. higher than among non-drinkers.

Miss Lina Ljungberg, of Wingaker, Sweden, sends us some very pretty verses in commemoration of the relief work in that country and in Finland and Lapland. One of these is as follows:

Heartfelt thanks, CHRISTIAN HERALD,
For the Christ-like display
Of love for the Northland,
Round the Bothnian Bay.

Miss Ljungberg's poem is one of many evidences proving that the people of the Northland remember with gratitude our readers' generosity.

F. T., Baltic, Mich. Explain the meaning of the following passage: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness?" Does this passage refer to the marriage state?

It may be accepted as referring to marriage, to business, or any other close relationship. It is really self-explanatory. The Christian can have little in common with the sceptic or the infidel, or even with those of an antagonistic faith; and he is wise therefore to keep clear of entanglements with such persons; otherwise the association may shake his own faith and wreck his happiness here and hereafter.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I wish to thank you for the beautiful premium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the marvelous Butterfly Calendar. It is indeed perfect in its colorings. I am a great friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and praise it whenever I have a chance, and I know that many take it, and think as well of it as I do, as the result of my recommending it to them and showing them my beautiful premiums.
MRS. C. VAN BLANKENSTEYN.
Brooklyn, Nov. 24.

Gip, O. T. Do the phenomena of the mind reveal the immortality of the soul?

There is much in mental phenomena that science is unable to explain, but it cannot be asserted that such phenomena reveal the fact of immortality. The awakening of spiritual life is distinct from what we term mental phenomena, and not until we feel this awakening do we begin to realize the truth of immortality.

M. C. L., Belford, N. J. A brown substance was found on the shore here. No one here knows what it is. Can you tell where its name and worth can be determined?

casionally do after a storm (the particles having been caught up from the ground by the wind), or it may have been washed up from the sea. If it should prove to be an aerolite, a mineralogist can determine its character.

Reader, Orange, N. J. Can a man be a true Christian and use a whip on a horse?

"A merciful man is merciful to his beast," says the proverb. The whip has its uses, but it should not be used to excess, and it should never be handled by a quick-tempered man. Properly used, there can be no reasonable objection. Some horses never need it; others would be of little use without it.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH.—I have this morning received my Pilgrim's Progress. It does not half express it when I say I am more than delighted. It is fine, both the clear print and the illustrations. I shall show it to all my friends. I thank you many, many times. It will be to me a treasure.
N. Y. City. MRS. D. S. STEPHENSON.

G. W. U., Pawling, N. Y. Where can a young man learn watch-making most quickly? Can one buy text-books that will tell him how?

We do not believe you can learn watch-making by reading and studying text-books, unless you have a special aptitude for that branch of mechanics. We advise you to begin in the regular way, by learning the business, from the rudiments up, in a practical establishment.

F. C. R., Canton, O. It is hard to make religion appeal to those whose employment is of a confining nature. Sunday is looked forward to by them as a breathing spell, when they can retire to the parks and out-door resorts, and there seek variety and change. Let us have Sunday as a day of worship, and Monday as a day of recreation.

The writer is probably a young man who has not yet taken up the tasks of life seriously. Age and experience will convince him that the proposition of devoting Monday to recreation would not pass muster here. In Russia and some other countries of Eastern Europe, and in certain parts of Asia, there are nearly as many holidays as working days in the year.

Reader, Bedford, Nova Scotia. What part of the United States would you consider best for an invalid of many years' suffering from bronchitis and other ailments, who feels the dampness very much, as well as the cold? As she is unable to take much exercise, her circulation is consequently bad. Her age is sixty years.

1. It is really a matter for a physician to decide. Colorado, Southern California, the vicinity of Asheville, N. C., or the Adirondacks, N. Y., are all excellent climates for bronchial affections. 2. We don't know the verses mentioned in your letter.

The Calendar came this evening. It is a beauty, so I hasten to thank you for it, The dear little faces! I wish I was able to put your valuable paper in every home as my dear Uncle Goodnow does in mine; then the sweet faces would shine from the Calendar and warm all hearts. ADDIE M. BAGG.
Waterloo, N. Y.

P. W. Reader, New York. Is it absolutely necessary to take a college course before becoming a missionary to heathen lands?

We think that the missionary societies would be willing to send out a man who had proved his fitness for the work, even if he had not been to college. A college course, however, would be a decided advantage to him; and probably between the two, the societies would choose a college man in preference to one who had no college training. In many heathen lands, especially India and China, the missionary needs to be well equipped in order to succeed.

I received the Butterfly Calendar. It is lovely. Have put it up where everyone can see it that calls. With many thanks, I remain true to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
Saginaw, Mich MRS. A. R. DODGE.

S. S., Winchester, Va. 1. Was the Roman Catholic Church the church established by Christ? 2. If she erred, as Protestants contend, must not we conclude that the promise of the Holy Spirit to guide it into all truth was not fulfilled?

1. We have no record in the Gospels of Christ establishing any church, in the sense of organizing one. The churches which sprang up under the teaching of the apostles after his death and ascension had very little in common with the Roman Catholic Church of the sixteenth century. Read the Acts and Paul's epistles and you will find they had no Mariolatry, no Popes, no sale of indulgences. There were abuses in them, as you will see by reading the second and third chapters of Revelation. Other abuses sprang up and increased, The Reformation was, as its name implies, a cleansing and purging of the church. It brought the church back to Christ's own teaching. 2. No, that promise is not warranted. Men do not always yield to the Holy Spirit. If the church had listened and been willing to submit to his guidance the Reformation would not have been needed.

M. E. W., Elgin, Neb. [illegible] in I Samuel 10:9 that God gave Saul another heart, imply regeneration? How then did he fall away?

It is doubtful if the expression carries so much meaning. It indicated a change in his character, but it was not permanent. He was disobedient and cruel afterwards. The statement is made later on (16:14) that the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, which would account for his rapid declension afterwards. He must have resisted the Spirit. His conduct from his accession onward shows his strong wilful nature, which had never been wholly subdued.

DEAR SIRS:—Received my premium, How I Worked My Way Around the World, yesterday, and am very much pleased with it. This morning I received the beautiful Butterfly Calendar, for which I am very thankful. It is beautiful. I am so glad you have children's faces on it, for I am a lover of children. Brooklyn, N. Y. CATHERINE M. HUNT.

MRS. J. M., Topeka, Kans. Will the books of today live like those of fifty years ago?

Yes, but probably not in the same proportion. It is reasonable to expect that with the vastly increased literary output more books will survive; but the percentage of survivals will be smaller. Cheap printing has made authorship comparatively easy of attainment. The market is glutted with books, probably not one in a hundred of which will be read or even heard of five years from now.

Inquisitive, Altoona, Pa. Is it right for a boy of thirteen to "tip" his hat to a girl of thirteen?

Why not? It proves that he is a little gentleman and has been properly trained.

C. L. Paul, Java, N. Y., writes:

I saw the account of the longest married couple in Michigan. We are the longest married couple in this place. We were married on September 13, 1840. We are natives of New York State. I was eighty-four years old last June, my wife was eighty years last March. We raised eight children, and the first break in the circle was September 17, last, when our son, fifty-six years old, passed on before us. My wife was a member of the Congregational Church before we were married, and I joined soon after. At our sixtieth anniversary, we sat down at table with our children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren.

W. Hatch, Farley, Iowa, writes:

We are the longest married couple in this State—my wife and I was born December 6, 1815, and Miss Ann Whitting, my wife, was born January 1, 1817. We were married April 17, 1838, and became members of the Baptist church in 1844. I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD over twenty-five years.

I received your beautiful Drop-Leaf Butterfly Calendar, and I think it cannot be made up in a more neat and artistic style than you have made it. I do not see how you can give so much away for the mere subscription price of your paper. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD alone is worth much more than your subscription price.
Pittsburg, Pa. ALF. E. GEISLER.

C. C. O., Kennedale, Tex. Was the baptism of John the Baptist Christian baptism?

No, it was introductory to Christian baptism. It was a baptism of repentance. There is no doubt, from the description of it by Matthew 3:5-12, that he baptized many who did not accept Christ and did not know anything about Christ when they were baptized. John's ministry was a call to reformation and righteousness, and he frankly acknowledged that it was only a preparation for a more radical and important work.

Emergency Bread Receipt

Corn Starch Talk

By Mrs. Helen Armstrong.

The use of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch in bread is not nearly so general as it might be if the advantages were known. A lightness and delicacy are assured by sifting a small proportion with a good bread flour, and the color is very attractive. If Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch be relied upon, success is certain, and we need have no fear of adulteration or unwholesomeness.

WHITE BREAD—QUICK METHOD.

ONE LOAF.

Soften one cake of compressed yeast with three tablespoons of lukewarm water. (A smaller quantity of yeast may be used with equally good results, simply taking more time for raising.) Sift into a bowl one and one-half cups of best patent flour, half a cup of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch and a teaspoon of salt. Pour into this gradually one cup of warm milk, the softened yeast cake, and beat the batter hard for five minutes. Cover closely and set aside to raise. When full of bubbles and almost doubled in bulk, beat the mixture again and work in about a cup and a half of flour, or enough to make a firm dough easily handled on the board without extra flour. When sufficiently kneaded, the dough will be even and smooth without any dry flour on the surface; it may then be shaped into a loaf (long and narrow preferred) and put into a well-buttered pan. Cover again, raise and brush over with soft butter when ready to bake. Have oven hot enough to brown the loaf lightly in ten minutes, then decrease the heat and finish baking, allowing about forty minutes in all. Remove from the pan immediately when it is done and place to cool where the air may circulate about it.

CONTRASTED LIVES*

The Parable of Dives and Lazarus a Lesson of the Result of Chosen Ideals

FROM the comments sometimes made on the Parable of Dives and Lazarus, it might be inferred that the one was punished simply because he was rich and the other was blessed and made happy simply as compensation for the misery he endured in this life. Such an understanding of the parable would be so contrary to Christ's general teaching, that it cannot be entertained for a moment. We may be sure that the poor man who is not in the kingdom in this world, will not be admitted into felicity beyond the grave, even though he suffered all and more than all the misery that Lazarus did. Neither will the rich man be condemned, though he had the largest fortune on earth, if in this life he has made his peace with God, through Christ. Far other than mere questions of station and possessions, are the causes which decide eternal destiny.

Where, then, are we to look for the lesson of the parable? The circumstances which called it forth furnish us with the clue. The avaricious and selfish Pharisees were in Christ's mind when he uttered the parable. The use they made of their wealth was an indication of character, and it is character which determines eternal destiny. "No man can serve two masters," Christ tells them. If they elect to serve God they must love the godly life; if they choose to serve Mammon, that is to devote all their thoughts and efforts to the acquisition of riches and to their selfish use, then they must take the consequences. The rich man spent his money on his dress and his table. He could not go out of his house without seeing Lazarus at his gate. Did it not occur to him that some of his abundance beyond the leavings from his table might have alleviated the beggar's hard lot? The fact that it did not, shows how hard, how cold, how unbrotherly was the man. He cared not that another was suffering. Even his dogs had more compassion than he. What else could become of such a man, when he came into the presence of God, than the repudiation that Christ describes? They that have not the spirit of Christ are none of his. The choice has to be made in this world whether we will follow him, lead his life and obey his precepts, or whether we will live for ourselves and for selfish gratification.

Moravian Missions.

A recent report shows that the Moravian Brethren have no fewer than 402 foreign missionaries with 98,599 people under their charge; 19,917 scholars in the Sunday Schools, and 24,198 in the day schools. In addition they have 26 ordained native ministers and 1,803 native helpers. Last year, it is stated, there was a net increase of 1,794 in the baptized membership of the native congregations. Commenting upon these soul-stirring statistics, the Moravian body being comparatively a small one, Rev. John Stewart, of Madras, has remarked: "If the other Churches of Christendom sent forth their missionaries in the same proportion as the Moravian Church there would be on the field 400,000 instead of 14,000." It is a fact far from creditable to the Church of Christ, that at present the missionaries are in touch with "less than a two-hundreth part of those for whom Jesus died."

The Bowery Mission's Thanksgiving

NEVER has a Thanksgiving season been more enthusiastically celebrated at the old Bowery Mission than this year. Day before Thanksgiving Dr. Klopsch made a thorough inspection of the premises, provisions and arrangements for feeding the large crowd that was expected. On Thanksgiving morning he was on hand bright and early, with inquiries respecting the distribution of baskets to families, and in the evening meeting he was also present.

The festivities commenced with an early morning breakfast, of hot coffee and rolls, for the homeless men. What a pathetic sight it was, that long line of ill-clad, shivering men, reaching as far down as Chatham square, waiting for the opening of the Mission doors! The great majority had been walking the streets all night in a bitter and piercing air.

The breakfast commenced punctually at three o'clock, and went on as long as there were any rolls or coffee left. In all about 5,000 men were fed. Baskets containing a Thanksgiving dinner for a family were distributed immediately after breakfast. Names and addresses had been carefully gathered, and the baskets were all neatly packed and labeled before the distribution began.

The Thanksgiving dinner was admirably arranged. Many of the Mission workers had been present all day, carving and packing single dinners in neat cardboard boxes. These boxes contained turkey, ham and chicken sandwiches, a piece of pie, two crullers and an apple. The doors were opened at seven o'clock. It did not take five minutes to fill every seat in the hall. The crowd remaining outside were then formed into line and received tickets entitling them to a dinner. As soon as the meeting commenced upstairs, in the main hall, the doors of the basement were opened, and the ticket holders marched in, where each man received his box and a cup of coffee, and passed out into the street through another door. Meantime the meeting, under the presidency of Mrs. Bird, went on with wonderful interest. At the conclusion the men marched out in quiet orderly fashion through to the basement hall, where each man received his box and cup of coffee like the others.

What a meeting it was! Mrs. Bird for several years past has always taken charge of this Thanksgiving service, and has made every man feel that it was a family gathering, and has introduced such sweet thoughts of home and dear ones as to compensate, in some measure, these poor wanderers for the home blessings they have lost. Mr. Benke, the organist, for half an hour before the meeting began, regaled the audience with some of his choicest organ music. Just as the opening prayer was about to be offered, Dr. Klopsch with his wife and son entered, and then everybody felt the family circle was complete. The Bowery Mission Male Quartette took charge of the music. Song seems to have extra power over the hearts of the men on Thanksgiving night, and this was increased by such songs as, "Do they think of me at home," sung by Mrs. Hallimond; "Be sure and come home for Thanksgiving," sung by Mr. Hunt; and "Home, sweet home," sung by Mr. Smyth.

Dr. Klopsch addressed the men, who listened with breathless attention, feeling that they were being spoken to by one who had their deepest interest at heart. He said that, though bereft of many of the legitimate pleasures of life, yet every man had abundant cause for gratitude. One thing they should never fail to thank God for, that he had given them another chance of salvation. "True, you have fallen, men," he said, "but you remember the boy who was once asked how he learned to skate, and who replied, 'by getting up every time that I fall'; so if you have fallen fifty times, get up again." Then came some wonderfully appropriate illustrations of men who have failed, and failed again, yet ultimately succeeded. Peter Cooper, Patrick Henry, Stephen Douglas, John G. Woolley were all instanced. Then came some stirring and emphatic words: "Men, if you only WILL, you CAN! The secret of the prodigal's successful restoration is to be found in three words, 'And he arose.' If you wish to succeed in life, and be men again, let that be your determination this Thanksgiving night, ARISE!" The final word of admonition was one of observing gratitude to God. Said the Doctor, "While it might be well for you to thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Bowery Mission, and Mrs. Bird, do not forget that these are only instruments. Let your thoughts rise higher and thank Him who is the giver of every good and perfect gift."

Our readers who have contributed to the Thanksgiving fund, may be assured that they have been the means in God's hands this year of supplying, not only the material needs of many a poor, helpless man, but of conveying to many hearts that powerful message of Divine Love which can only be imparted by Christlike deeds done in a Christlike spirit.

Century LIFE-INSURANCE CLUB

For Men and Women.

An Institution of Convenience and Aid for Insurers.

Series A, Limited to One Thousand Memberships.

Any institution that is human succeeds. The Century Life-Insurance Club is most decidedly human. It is a success—a bigger one than was promised or dreamed.

Men and women of thrift and brains, with all sorts of occupations and representing all sorts of callings and living in all parts of the country, are taking membership just as fast as they can be written, if not a little faster.

Now, why are things this way? In other words, why do people apply and applaud? The answer to these three questions is wrapped up in the following:

Club Points and Privileges.

1st. The Club literature fights shy of "statistics" and technicalities and makes the insurance proposition plain and interesting to every body.

2d. People want high-grade insurance and like the idea of being able to get it in a pleasant and quiet and easy way. If you need good health, a small bank pass-book showing $1.00, payable when convenient, entitles you (with your present state of health) to obtain for each member an unassailable Endowment Policy for $1,000, or more, in one of the reliable Insurance Companies at the usual rate, but on small installments deposited monthly for a few months, according to age, and a gift of $5.00 or more for the Club member. All facts concerning the Insurance Company which has been selected to issue the Club policies, its premium rates, guarantees, etc., are fully expounded in the Club literature which is exceedingly interesting and instructive.

3d. The use of the Club rooms, which are beautifully furnished and located right in the heart of New York, is free to all members, resident and non-resident. It is quite a nice thing, if you are visiting the metropolis, to be able to feel "at home" as soon as you strike town.

In short, this is just about the surest way to save money SAFELY that has ever been placed within your reach. And besides, if you SHOULD be unexpectedly called away, the friends who are left behind have a substantial token of your unselfishness and regard.

How to Join.

On request, the Secretary will send you by mail full particulars with a blank application for membership. However, he cannot do this satisfactorily unless you answer the two following questions in your first letter:

1st. What is your occupation? 2d. What is the exact date of your birth?

Gratitude, Confidence, Regret.

"I am grateful for having the opportunity to become a member of the Club. I have been pleased by the information and courtesy so far shown me, and am glad that I am a member. I feel that the Club is a good thing, and I am willing to do all I can to help it along. I am glad that I joined when I did, and regret that I did not do so sooner. I feel that I have got my money's worth already, and that I have got a good thing. I am glad that I joined, and

MAGI IN ADORATION

The First Homage Christ Received

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IT was but consistent that at the birth of One who was come to fulfil the long line of prophecies, wise men, or magi, should come to do him homage. The evangelist Luke, who gives his portrait as Son of Man, omits this, and his birth is announced to shepherds as a Saviour: "Unto you is born . . . a Saviour which is Christ the Lord" (Luke 2). It is when the heir to a throne is born that distinguished personages come or send their congratulations, and thus it was when the magi arrived in Jerusalem with their question, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the East, and are come to worship him." Where is he? Jerusalem—which should have been in eager expectation of such an event, if her scribes had read the Scriptures in simple dependence upon God for light, and had not "made the commandment of God of none effect by their traditions" (Mark 7: 13)—knew nothing of the birth of her King!

The magi were sure of their guidance; the ignorance and indifference of Jerusalem might astonish them, but it should not rob them of the purpose of their long and tedious journey. They had been guided from above, and they knew they were in the right way. So little was the population of Jerusalem in expectation of the advent of the Messiah, that the coming of the magi was a trouble to them! They had settled down as a Roman province; they were contented with the rule of Herod; why bring in a disturbing element? So speak the heathen about their idolatry; so speak unconverted professors in our churches; so speak the worldlings around us. Men do not relish being reminded of the claims of God and do not welcome a message from the upper world. The introduction of God as the living God, who claims attention now, who is going to judge man according to his response to those claims, is looked upon by many as an affront. Men harden one another by mutual indifference; and yet every day is one day nearer to the time when God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing; whether it be good or whether it be evil.

But in his position as king, Herod could not ignore the mission of the magi. It might be very unpleasant, but he must give some answer; so, being ignorant of the Scriptures himself, he gathered together all the chief priests and scribes of the people and inquired of them where the Christ should be born. They were ready with their answer, for they did search the Scriptures (John 5: 39 R.V.), and yet with such blinded eyes, through their traditional theology, that they could not see Christ in them. They answered, "In Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophet (Micah 5: 2, 3): And thou Bethlehem, land of Judah, art in no wise least among the princes of Judah, for out of thee shall come a Governor which shall be Shepherd of my people Israel." But so little power had this word of God upon them, that neither king, nor priests, nor scribes took the trouble to go to Bethlehem and see for themselves! How must such indifferrence have struck the magi? Thus it came to pass that the magi went unaccompanied to Bethlehem. Herod called them; inquired carefully when the star appeared, and in his hypocrisy, with quite other intentions in his heart, he said to them "Go and search out carefully concerning the young Child, and when ye have found him, bring me word that I also may come and worship him" (Matt. 2: 3-8).

Once out of the atmosphere of Herod's court, the magi found again the guiding star, which they had followed from their distant home. All the discouragement, perhaps even doubt, which the attitude of Herod and Jerusalem to the birth of the King-Messiah had brought them into was gone; they had to do with God and heaven again; and "when they saw the star they rejoiced with exceeding joy" (v. 9). Such as have been sorely disappointed in Christians and religious teachers will be able to understand and enter into the exceeding joy of these men when they knew, with absolute certainty, that they were on the right track. The heavenly guidance that had led them so far had not deserted them.

THE VISION OF PEACE*

Conflict Among the Nations, Individuals and Animals to Eventually Cease

HOW far the world still is from the ideal condition that the prophet saw in spiritual vision! His pictures, not only men living in peace and amity, but such a transformed world as Paul looked forward to (Rom. 8:22), when the whole creation, now groaning and travailing in pain, would be renovated and restored. How this will come we know not, but we are assured that it will come through Christ, and that the way to the golden age lies in humanity coming into accord with him and being permeated with his spirit. Who can tell what would be the effect of the presence of that Wonderful Being on the earth, if men, instead of despising and persecuting him, gave themselves to learn of him and to do his will? His power over nature seemed to be unlimited, and we may be sure that when he comes to reign, it will be exercised for the benefit of the world. The competition, the fierce struggle to wrest the prizes of life from other hands and to seize and hold them for our own use, is the same in principle as the lion and the tiger display. As James said, wars come from lusts, and the lust of territory in a nation is of the same nature as lust of money in an individual and as the lust of prey in a beast. When Christ puts forth his power, this prolific source of conflict will be taken away and peace will ensue.

Though war is continually threatened, and even now hangs like a dark cloud over the far East, where Japan and Russia confront one another in menace; and though any one of a dozen unsettled questions might precipitate war among the nations, there are distinct signs of improvement. Statesmen now shrink from war as they never did before. There is an increasing preponderance of peace-loving men in all Christian lands. It is realized everywhere that war is an evil, a detriment, which some would avoid from policy, and others on principle. This spirit, which must increase, can never give peace to the world, but it may prepare the way for it. The real hope for world-wide peace lies in the world's submission to Christ. It may come before he returns, in submission to his will; it will certainly come when he returns, for his will will then be supreme, and his commands will be obeyed by all the potentates of the world.

came around, and now the chance had come! In his delight he forgot, for a moment, his mother and her struggle to care for him, and the need that he should work for her. But it was only a moment.

"Oh, it would be so good, so wonderful, to go to school," he said. "I wish I might, but I must not. Mother is not strong any more, and I am old enough to earn money for her and the girls."

"I knew he would say that," broke in his mother, showing her happy face at the door. "I knew he would say that, but you don't need to, my son. Miss Deborah has bought our place for the home of the man who carries on her farm, and it brings me money enough to take care of the girls. For myself, I shall not leave her. I am to stay just here, and help her to get well and help her after she is well," and she turned away to hide the happy tears.

And so the better days began, born of a brave lad's purpose to bear his mother's burden.

THE SWEET OLD SONG

She sat in the window, singing in her clear, sweet, girlish voice—
Whose lute-like echoes, ringing, made my sad old heart rejoice;
And there seemed to drift from a distant shore some far-off psalm of praise;
For she sang as her mother used to sing, in the dear old golden days.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Subscriber, Shelter Island, N. Y. 1. Is there any authority in the Bible for secret societies? 2. Who wrote the eighty-fourth psalm?

1. None that we know of. Freemasonry claims to have originated with King Solomon, but there is no authority in the Bible for the claim. 2. We do not know, nor does any one else. Even the date of it is unknown, but it is generally supposed to have been written after the exile.

W. W. L., Shenandoah, Ia. Is there a life subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? If so, what is it?

It is simply this: On contributing $10 towards the erection of a Children's Temple at our Mont-Lawn Home, you receive a life subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—The Butterfly Calendar has reached me this morning, many thanks. I think it very lovely, and the beautiful child faces brighten the large window in my sitting-room ever so much. I am a great admirer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and speak of it in such terms to my friends.
Plainwell, Mich. ELIZABETH ANDERSON.

M. J. P., New Brunswick, Can. (1) What period is intended in the seven times of Daniel 4:25? (2) What would be the best way of spending Sunday, if there is no church accessible? (3) Is it customary among modern Jews to allow the beard to grow? (4) Where can a copy of the Apocrypha be procured?

1. A time in the prophetic books is always supposed to be a year. 2. If there is a family in that condition, by all means gather them together once if not twice in the day, and hold a service. Read the Bible and pray, and, if possible, sing a hymn or two. The sermon, published every week in this journal might be read aloud. This is actually done, as we are glad to know, in many isolated farmhouses, with very gratifying results. If you are alone, there should always be a season of reading and prayer, so that the day shall serve the purpose for which it was instituted of bringing the soul into communion with God. 3. Orthodox Jews allow it to grow. They trim it, but do not shave. Reformed Jews follow their own inclinations. 4. Macmillans, in New York, publish a handy edition in small volumes, edited by Dr. Moulton. Many old editions of the Bible contain the Apocrypha.

H. R. S., Menomonee Falls, Wis. Is it right to operate a telephone switchboard on the Sabbath day, and what do you think of professing Christians who take advantage of exchange and long distance service on the Sabbath?

We have many times stated that the only work that can be rigidly justified on the Lord's Day is a work of absolute necessity or of mercy. Business, as such, is not justifiable.

F. E. L., Orwell, Pa., sends these appreciative lines on receiving his premiums:

Each member of the "family"

And expectation, to the time
Of premiums, so neat and bright.
A Testament—the Story new—
Right from the press so bless'd and true.
A Bible and a Calendar,
Or Pilgrim's Progress, dress'd anew,—

H. C. De R., N. Baltimore, O. What is the difference between the Kingdom of Heaven and the Kingdom of God?

The terms are practically synonymous.

Miss Fannie T., New Richmond, Ind. What are some of the things a church society may justifiably do to earn money?

We invite the views of THE MAIL BAG'S readers on this question. In answering, we would suggest that the matter of propriety be kept in view. The discussion will prove mutually helpful.

W. W. R., Marion, Kans. Does the Bible command to put the convicted murderer to death apply to this age and nation?

It has been contended by the advocates of capital punishment that, as the command (Gen. 9:6) antedated the Mosaic code, it was intended to survive it. That inference, however, is rather a doubtful and insubstantial ground for so important a matter. It seems probable that if God had intended the practice to continue as a permanent obligation, throughout all time, that some more definite and explicit intimation of that permanency would have been given. Whether it is advisable to continue the penalty is a larger question, and there are many weighty reasons for and against it. We ought, however, to have some surer and better reason for putting the murderer to death than that at that early age of the world God ordered it to be done. If, therefore, any State or nation arrived at the conclusion that the interests of the community might be better served by punishing a murderer in some other way, we think it need not be deterred by the ancient command from making the experiment.

Dear Sir:—The book, How I Worked My Way Around the World, and the Calendar, both arrived to-day. The Calendar is beautiful, with a capital "B," and the book very interesting. The book alone is worth the price of both book and paper.
Rochester, N. Y. A. HUBREGTSE.

S. E. Y., Fordtown, E. Tenn. The domestic labor problem is in a tangle, and just so long as writers persist in speaking of the employer of domestic labor as "mistress" of her domestic help, the problem will remain unsolved, and there will be enmity between the mistress and her domestic help. And just so long as writers continue to speak of domestic workers as "servants," they will fail to prove that there is nothing degrading in domestic labor as a profession for our free American girls. Where is the law of justice to impose the name "servant" on the domestic and not on other laborers? Are they not working and receiving wages just as the stenographer, clerk, or any other who works for wages? Then why in the name of American liberty must the domestic alone wear the name "servant"?—the one and only degrading thing about domestic labor. If this is not true, and the domestic laborer is indeed a servant in America, then let us as American people put on a more noble national pride and raise the banner higher, and let the breeze of liberty sweep out that dusty fold that would refuse to cover the domestic laborer. I should like to hear from others on this subject.

L. A. T., Westminster, S. C. 1. Is it right for Christians to eat the flesh of swine? 2. Is sanctification a second blessing, a cleansing of the soul subsequent to conversion? 3. Are young people's societies a benefit to the church?

1. The decision of the apostles recorded in Acts 15:5-29, shows that the dietary laws, with a few exceptions, were not held to be binding on the Gentile converts. There is, therefore, so far as we can see, no religious prohibition against that food, although there may be objections to it on sanitary grounds. 2. Sanctification begins at conversion. When the soul yields to Christ, the man is justified, so that conversion is synonymous with justification. Then the process of sanctification begins and is continued through life. It is more than cleansing; it includes power to lead a holy life and engage in Christian service. Justification may be compared to the pardon of a criminal, sanctification to his being trained to lead an honest life; only that sanctification is far above and beyond any human training. 3. Experience has proved their usefulness. The charge you mention, that is made against them, only shows, if it is true, how a good thing may be abused.

IF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 25, C. A. M. D., Mortonsville, Ky., asks who was the author of the lines:

"Our wasting lives grow shorter still
As days and months increase."

Isaac Watts was the author, it can be found in any old Methodist hymn book. In one edition it is in Hymn 1058, commencing:

"Thee we adore eternal Name!
And humbly own to thee."

Altoona, Pa.

L. C., Boston, Mass. Did Christ really make it a condition of discipleship that a man should hate his near relatives, as is stated in Luke 14:26?

Christ's life and teaching show that he could have meant nothing of the kind. His spirit was one of love, not of hate. The expression is one used elsewhere in the Bible, and was common in Jewish talk, indicating comparison. Deut. 21:15 is a case in point. The question there is undoubtedly between one loved and one less loved. The context in Luke shows that Christ demanded the supreme love of the heart, and that should any occasion arise when the claims of kindred, or even of life itself, were antagonistic to those of Christ, they must, any or all of them, be sacrificed for his sake. A man who was not prepared to do this was not worthy to be his disciple. Luke 16:13 puts the same principle in another form.

We are pleased to have this endorsement from a distinguished authority of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S movement for an improved hymnology.

DECEMBER 3, 1903.
To the Editor of the Christian Herald:
Permit me to thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the effort it is making to bring about a reform and a betterment in the class of hymns used in many of our Protestant churches. The so-called "Gospel Song," in the past few years, has deteriorated to meaningless words, set to movements that suggest the ball-room and the beer concert-halls. The makers of these melodies have appealed more to the "sole" than to the "soul," the whole purpose seeming to be to secure a peculiar and catcy rhythm, rather than good, solid harmony.

The objection is often made, that the average congregation cannot sing the good music found in most of the church hymnals, and that easy, catchy music begets better singing. Let the objectors pay a visit to the great Auditorium at Ocean Grove, and hear, Sunday after Sunday during the summer months, congregations of ten thousand people singing "Abide With Me," like a well-trained chorus, as to time and expression. Then listen to the martial strains of "The Son of God Goes Forth to War," and music of that nature—then they will be convinced that congregations can sing and sing well, the best of music.

Of course, as long as professional quartettes are permitted to do the singing of the congregation, congregational singing is impossible. I see no reason why, on Sunday evenings, fifteen to thirty minutes could not be properly and profitably devoted to a congregational rehearsal under the direction of a good precentor, and learn good hymns. Once mastered, the jingle songs would never again take place in church worship.

TALI ESEN MORGAN,
Director of Music at Ocean Grove.

Subscriber, Jersey City, N. J. Do you think the church should provide amusements and clubs? Is it not its duty to preach the Gospel and save souls?

The church should do everything in its power to elevate the people, and alleviate the awful suffering that poverty entails. Its first duty, as you say, is to preach the Gospel and save souls, but those duties need not be neglected in attending to the other. In fact, by brightening the lives of the poor, they are better prepared for listening to the Gospel. Christ fed the multitude, and he healed diseases, though his mission to the world was a much higher one than that. There is a prejudice among the poor against the church, because the impression has grown up that the church does not sympathize with their hard lot. If that prejudice can be removed by doing them kindly service, there is a better prospect of souls being saved.

THE "CHRISTIAN HERALD" GOSPEL HALL IN INDIA

OUR readers will be pleased to see the above picture, showing the improvements which have been made in the building which serves as mission station, preaching hall, and school for orphans, at Bapatla, India. A picture of the front of this edifice has already been published in this journal. This is a rear view, from which an idea can be gained of the additions which have been made. All the greater interest attaches to the Institution because it is a permanent recognition of the services rendered to India by the readers of this journal. It is named "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD GOSPEL HALL," thus becoming a memorial of the magnificent benefaction which our readers sent to the people of that afflicted land in their time of trouble. All the denominations sent sincere and hearty thanks, and the Government of India officially acknowledged the benefits conferred, but this naming of an institution to commemorate the service was a graceful and gratifying act, done spontaneously without any suggestion from us, and is therefore all the more pleasing. Dr. George N. Thomssen, who is personally known to many of our readers, is in charge of the Institution and is doing exceedingly valuable work. Among the orphans being educated there, are seventy-three who are supported by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. Dr. Thomssen writes most encouraging reports of their progress. Not only are they gaining knowledge, but are beco ming Christians. Ten of them have given such clear proofs of conversion, that Dr. Thomssen administered to them the rite of baptism by immersion.

Rich and Poor Looking Forward to Christmas

Holiday Scenes in New York

The Markets a Forest of Evergreens, Toys and Tinsel

THERE are few more attractive sights than the busy thoroughfares of New York, during the week preceding Christmas. Crowds of gay shoppers, rich and poor together, throng the sidewalks, and look in at the attractive displays in the windows. Children, fascinated by the toys which the itinerant sidewalk venders display, stand in open-mouthed wonder, and watch the funny evolutions of the mechanical novelties on the curb. Even the grown-ups cannot resist the infectious spirit of the holiday season, and laugh quite as heartily as the youngsters.

Our photographer, in the illustrations in this issue, has pictured some scenes that are familiar to New Yorkers in holiday week—the markets, with their forests of evergreens; the sidewalks, with their endless lines of attractions for the little folks; the store windows, full of Christmas novelties that win the hearts and open the purses of the shoppers. Those spruces and pines and cedars that now lie piled so closely together, were frosted with snow atop of some hill in Maine or Vermont, only a week ago. A week hence, each will stand in its own proper place in some American home, as a beautiful Christmas tree, loaded with pretty gifts, that reflect themselves dazzlingly in blown glass, paste, tinsel, and spangles. Then will come that critical moment after "candle-lighting time," when the tree stands revealed in all its illuminated glory, each fronded and cotton-flecked branch bending under its load of gifts, and when the children leap and dance around it in Christmas frolic, or stand and "gaze their fill" in silent admiration. Poor, indeed, must be the home that has no Christmas tree; sad the childhood that never felt the thrill that comes with the first vision of the wonderful gift-bearer.

It is not so very long ago since Christmas trees were almost unknown in American homes. While every German family, no matter how poor, had its fir boughs strung with gilded nuts and kuchen, and while the children of France and England danced around their brilliantly lighted and decorated Christmas trees, all that young America knew of the beautiful tree was learned from pictures and stories. Occasionally one might find a family making merry around a tree, but these were few and far between. Up in Pennsylvania, however, where the German emigrants have a large colony, and among the German woodcutters in the Catskills in New York, people kept up the customs of the Vaterland, and the fir and pine branches flourished in great glory at Christmas.

Finally, a New York mountain woodcutter, Mark Carr, decided to teach the people how to really enjoy the great holiday; so one year, as it drew near to the 25th of December, he said to his wife, "My dear, I am going to cut some cedar boughs and take them down to New York to sell." The good woman laughed at him. But Mark Carr was a sturdy fellow, set in his way, and he remembered the Germans who had come up in the mountains year after year to get the greens, and he recalled their delight at the sight of them.

"I believe," he said, "that I can sell these green boughs in New York, and I am going to try it."

When Mark Carr appeared in the metropolis with his load of Christmas trees he was looked upon as a curiosity and hailed with delight. His truckful was sold inside of an hour, at prices ranging from one dollar to five dollars per tree, according to size, and when he took the train home at night he carried with him the happiest heart that ever beat beneath a woodsman's jacket. The next two days he was busy felling trees, and on the third day he started again for the station, his wagon piled high with the young firs, which he speedily sold. The following year he took a great many more to market, but he found competitors and the prices fell. Meanwhile the Jerseymen began to get their loads of greens into the Philadelphia market. The custom of gathering and selling greens and trees from the American forests at Christmas was soon in full swing.

Today the Christmas tree traffic has grown to enormous proportions. Maine for a time furnished ninety per cent. of the trees which were hauled into cars and sent West and South. All the northern states now deal regularly in Christmas trees. The woods that furnish spruce and fir are sold on contract, and the jobber visits them in October to size them up. He offers so much apiece for each tree "as they run"—usually about three dollars a hundred—and the money is made payable on delivery of the trees at the nearest railroad station.

In the city, the jobber sells them to the wholesaler, getting about seven dollars a hundred, after which the wholesaler sells them at the retailer at a good profit, and the retailer, in turn, does his best to get big prices from the housewife and the head of the family. Boughs sell for little, the largest price, because of their scarcity, being for pines and spruces. After these comes the cedar tree and cedar, but when they are crowned with gorgeous tinsel and brilliant baubles and strung with pearls, ropes, rings and presents, one does not see much of the form of the tree itself.

For months before the Christmas holidays, Santa Claus' workshops have been busy, and the number of dolls and toys turned out in a season to be sold in stores would be amazing. In New York City there are many toy warehouses—toy factories, they are called—where the deft fingers of clever young men and women fashion and produce countless thousands of dolls of all sorts, sizes, conditions and prices, and where the ingenious minds of men are employed to conjure the most novel of Toyland, from jointed dolls that can stand upright to make a Lilliputian home or vast dimensional dream. Here pets, the animals and a score of more smaller Christmas presents are forming the subject of the most fascinating study to the children of the land. Bewildering displays of tinsel, paste and glass, and the countless yards of many hues that compose the evergreen glory of the Christmas tree. From these workshops also comes a great variety of mechanical toys that delight the juvenile heart. Jacks-in-the-box, toy pianos, all sorts of conditions of soldiers, drums and guns, which are sold early in the season at one dollar a dozen, and which are kept busy by June, July, August, and September.

In the joy of Christmas preparations and Christmas cheer in our own homes let us not forget those who are needy within our gates. At this season of generosity and

TRUE FRIENDS

TEXT — III. JOHN 14

"GREET THE FRIENDS BY NAME"

ETYMOLOGY is the historian of language. It is the huge wardrobe in which are hung up the verbal garments, ancient and modern, with which Thought has been, and is accustomed to clothe herself. It is the international and inter-racial laboratory, in which one alphabet is seen, to a more or less extent, to be in harmony with all other alphabets, the same as the study of biology proves that the physical structures of all living creatures, both animal and vegetable, have been evolved primarily from the same plan. Thus we find that as social styles in dress change, so the verbal garments for one thought are sometimes discarded, and new thoughts are found to be wearing the cast-off verbal clothes of other thoughts.

The ancient word, "barbarian," had an entirely different significance from its meaning in the present day. When I say to you, "he is a barbarian," you immediately picture a savage, a brutal cannibal, a black-skinned roamer of the African forest, or a Malay murderer, who would as willingly cut out your heart as a hawk might plunge his crooked beak into the vitals of a dove, or a helpless fawn. But when Paul wrote in his Epistle to the Romans, "I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians," he meant he was a debtor to those who were not living under Cæsar's jurisdiction. He used the word "barbarian" in the same sense as the Chinese now use it. "Among the Chinese," writes the lexicographer, "one who is not a Chinaman, and especially a European, or an American, is commonly spoken of as a 'Western barbarian.'" The ancient word, "wit," was originally derived from the old Saxon verb "witan," which meant "to know." In ancient language, a "wit" meant a "knower," one versed in knowledge, an erudite man. The modern word "wit," signifies a humorous entertainer, a "funny" man. The ancient word "heathen," meant one who lived outside the intellectual cities. The modern word "heathen," is now applied to a person ignorant of the Gospel. The Spanish word "caballero," originally meant "a man who traveled on horseback." The modern word "cabaliero" means "a gentleman." The Spanish word "peon," originally meant "one who goes on foot." The modern word "peon," means "a peasant." Now, the simple fact is, in modern Spain many a gentleman goes on foot, and many a peasant rides.

Characteristics of a Friend

Thus, we also find that the word "friends," of my text, has an entirely different meaning from what the casual reader might at first suppose. The modern word "friend," in popular discourse, means an acquaintance, one with whom we can socially pass a pleasant hour, one who is upon our calling list, one who invites us to his home, as we may invite him to our daughter's wedding-party for his company. But in ancient times the Biblical word "friend," had a deeper, holier meaning. It meant one who, in the truest and purest sense, had his life wrapped up in our life. As John Wesley gave the definition: "It meant one who was bound to us by self-sacrifice, and the blood relation of the atoning cross." It meant a Christian brother.

The modern definition of the word "friend" is as different from the Biblical, as a wolf traveling around in sheep's clothing is at heart different from a lamb! "The friendship of most men in these days," wrote John Spencer, "is like some plants in the water, which have broad leaves on the surface of the water, but scarce any root at all; like drums and trumpets and ensigns in battle, which make a noise and a show, but act nothing." Therefore, O man and woman, in this sermon I would try to describe for you who are your true friends, and also show you whether you are true friends to others. From among the scores and hundreds of your acquaintances I would single out a few noble spirits, whose love you ought to cultivate, and whose affections you should treasure in the "holy of holies" of your innermost heart.

The true friend, in the first place, is always the one who loves the Lord his God with all his heart and soul and mind, before he tries to love his brother as himself. He is the one who would translate into his own life, in a spiritual sense, the oft-quoted advice which Polonius gave to his departing son, Laertes, "To thine own self be true, and it must follow as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man." He is as brave and noble in his relation to his Divine Friend, first of all, as was the late Christian gentleman, Senator and Secretary of State, Hamilton Fish. One night he was dining out with a Senatorial colleague, who made an irreverent remark in reference to Jesus Christ. At first Mr. Fish looked surprised, and then pained, at the blasphemous laughter of his political associate. Then he turned, and quietly but firmly said, "Senator, you must pardon me for what I am about to say, but I must request you to desist from repeating any such remarks in my presence. I firmly believe in Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world. Of his church I am a member, in my house I have tried to honor Him, and in His faith I expect to die. If you care longer to claim me as your friend, then in my presence, at least, you must make no slurring remarks against One whom I look upon as my best of all friends."

A true earthly friend must, in the first place, be a true friend to his Heavenly Friend, as was Isaac Newton. He so impressed everyone with whom he came in contact with his noble loyalty to his Divine Master, that when his friend, the great philosopher, Gottfried Leibnitz, was dying, he cried out again and again in his last sickness, "O, thou God of Isaac Newton, have mercy upon me!" And yet, strange to say, there are scores of us who seem to think that our true friends can be true to us while being untrue to their better selves. If they drink with us because we get drunk, and gamble with us because we gamble, and sinfully fritter away their lives because we, as spendthrifts, are squandering ours, we call them friends, true friends. As Lord Melbourne, the British Prime Minister, once brutally expressed this sentiment, "I do not call a man a friend who merely stands by me when I am right. But I want a friend who is willing to stand by me and uphold me in political life, even when he knows that I am wrong."

Friends of God

A true friend, in the Biblical sense, is never untrue to his God or to his better self. "Well," says some one, "how am I to know whether a friend is first true to God before he is true to me?" Oh, my brother, you need never have put that question to me. You know intuitively those among your associates who are always true to God without my telling you. A prominent Eastern newspaper man, who for years was detailed as the Albany correspondent of a great New York daily, told me that every year the lobbyists divided the New York legislators into three distinct classes: First, there were those who, like Cæsar's wife, were above suspicion. They were honest through and through. No man would dare approach them with the idea of offering them a bribe. They would not dare to approach them with a dishonorable proposal any more than they would dare ask the President of the United States to appoint a Minister Plenipotentiary to England for the consideration of a $5,000 check, or they would dare ask King Edward to create William Waldorf Astor a member of the House of Lords for a bribe of $1,000,000. The second class at Albany were the "doubtful legislators." They might be bribed, if the money offered was big enough, and they thought they would not be found out. The third class were the men who were there to sell their votes to the highest bidders, no matter who those bribers might be, or how much the iniquitous railroad corporation might desire to defraud the common people, whose interests those legislators had taken a solemn oath to protect. Likewise in every-day life, each man comes in contact with three distinct classes of associates. First, there are those men and women who, like Cæsar's wife, are above suspicion. They are true men. True to themselves, and true to their God. You would no more dare tell a vile story before them than you would dare tell such a filthy story to your Christian mother. Next, there are the "doubtful friends." They might, or might not, be open to a wrong proposition. Then there is the third class of men; those whom you know to be what they ought not to be, and who make a boast of their sins.

The Warnings of Friendship

Practical advice for this classification: From the bad men, turn away your face with firm resolve. You cannot associate with scoundrels without you yourself becoming a party to their infamies. With the "doubtful class" of associates be very chary of your friendship. Never allow any one to enter the inner chambers of your heart until he has proved his virtue and nobility beyond all doubt.

> The man who hails you, Tom or Jack,
> And proves by thumps upon your back
> How he esteems your merit,
> Is such a friend, that one had need,
> Be very much his friend indeed,
> To pardon, or to bear it.

The third class of your acquaintances represent God's noblemen. These can be numbered among the blessed few who are spiritually trying to make the most out of their lives. These seek; these trust; these bind to you by the unbreakable ties of affection. These cherish all through life, up to the brink of the grave. These are the kind of Biblical friends to whom the Apostle John sent his Gospel salutation. The true friend corrects his brother's faults, as well as commends his virtues. He warns him of a moral danger, as he would warn his friend of a physical danger if, on a winter's day, he saw him skating too near an air-hole in the ice; or if, while boating upon the river, he saw him rowing too near the dangerous dam; or if he saw him bathing too near the "sea puss," towards which the treacherous undertow was trying to drag him. The Ten Commandments of Mount Sinai which God, with his finger for a pen, wrote upon leaves of stone, are filled with, "Thou shalt nots." Therefore, one of the great missions of true friendship is, as Paul described it, to "reprove, rebuke," as well as to "exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine."

Tactful Correction

"No, no," says some one, "I do not agree with you at all. I believe it is an enemy whose mission is to point out faults. The true mission of a friend is to encourage and commend virtues. Alas! by bitter experience I have found out the truth of this statement. Some years ago, three of my friends and I entered into an agreement. They were at that time my dearest friends. We decided that we would meet at least once a week, and for mutual benefit we would tell each other all the criticisable things we had seen or heard about each other. We entered into this agreement purely for the purpose of correcting each other's faults. We had just two such proposed meetings, and then broke up in a big row. We have never been the same to each other since. No talking to me about a friend's faults. If my friends have faults, they must be told about them by some one else." Oh, my brother, you are wrong. You are entirely wrong. A friend, a true friend, should be able to come to a brother, as a loving mother could to her wayward child, and tell him of the moral mistakes he is making. This does not mean, as some people suppose, that the true mission of friendship is to gather up all the mean and contemptible sayings which have been spoken about one, and then re-tell them to his brother. No bouquet of fragrant beauties can be collected from among the stinging nettles and the poisonous ivies growing knee-deep in the stenchful swamps. I once had one of those so-called friends, who thought the chief mission of his life was to fling at me all the criticisms and the hyper-criticisms he ever heard spoken against me and my work. He kept me in hot water all the time. Until I stopped associating with him, he made me doubt whether I did have anyone who ever loved me or my family.

Faithful in Prosperity

But though the mission of true friendship consists not in peddling evil reports, it does have a mission in lovingly and tenderly correcting the wrong-doings of our dear ones. Johann Goethe, the most famous poet and dramatist of German literature, once expressed this beautiful thought: "When we are young, we think we shall build palaces for the gods; but at last we are glad if we have dug away some of the rubbish at our feet." Ah, that statement is true. When we are young, we have an ambition to reform the whole universe. But when we grow older, we have narrowed down the hope of our life to this simple desire: We hope that we may live right ourselves. We hope that we may be able to remove from our friends' paths some of the impediments over which we ourselves have stumbled. We hope to do the same as Forbes Mitchell did during the awful siege of Lucknow. After he was nearly blown to pieces by a powder magazine, concealed within the residency by the Sepoys, he immediately warned his English friends, lest they might heedlessly run into the same danger. And my brother, mark this: If you are not gratefully willing to be corrected in a moral fault by a true friend, then you are not fit to have any Christian man for a close associate.

The true friend is one who rejoices with us in our successes, as well as sympathizes with us in our failures. "Oh," you say, "that is a universal, self-evident desire. There is no danger of any friend not rejoicing with us when we succeed in life. The only danger is that these friends will turn their backs upon us when we are defeated." Steady, brother, steady. I am surprised at your answer. I am amazed, first, that you have not found out the error of your belief by personal experience.

Ready are you to grant that enemies rejoice at our overthrow, and are sorry at our triumphs. But in one sense, many of our acquaintances are actuated by the same motives. When tripped up in the race of life, many of our friends are ready to say: "Poor fellow! Is it not too bad that my friend So-and-So failed in business? Is it not too bad that John lost all the good feeling. In every city and every town there are poor, to whom we can at least give one cheerful day by remembering them at this season. Let none go hungry at Christmas time, if you can reach them with a gift and a blessing. It will be returned to you tenfold.

Few cities in the world—certainly no others in our own land—have such an army of homeless and destitute, as that which finds its way every winter to New York. This year, the Bowery Mission is making a special effort to help these forlorn and unemployed crowds of men and boys during Christmas week—to give them a cordial welcome, a word of Christian cheer and a wholesome meal. If it be possible, we hope, with the aid of our readers, to let no boy or man suffer during Christmas week from hunger. In another part of this issue, there is printed an appeal in their behalf, to which we trust our readers will make a hearty and generous response.

East Side Waifs' Christmas

Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery Boys," sends us this appeal in behalf of the poor children of the East Side, for whom she is now preparing her annual Christmas tree:

TO THE READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD—DEAR FRIENDS:—No sooner is Thanksgiving, with its cheer for the old folks passed and gone, than the frosty air seems to throb with a new spirit peculiar to childhood. Christmas is coming, and hope and expectancy are written on the faces of all our little folks for this is a veritable children's quarter. Unlike the children of wealth, who, it [illegible] money he inherited from his father?" But they often sympathize with us in the self-complacent way which, translated in the ordinary language of life, means: "It is too bad; but if John had only been as smart as I am he would never have lost his money. Now he is just as poor as the rest of us, and he can no longer live in a fine house, or have his daughter taking music lessons, or his son go to college." But let a man make a success; let him strike a big profit in a real estate investment; let him have a $5,000 income, when we only have a $1,000, and it will take a mighty onslaught of Christian grace in our hearts to throttle the demon of envy gnawing within our breasts. Jonathan was a true friend to David. He loved the poet-statesman, the shepherd-boy warrior, in spite of the fact that David, and not he, the natural heir, was to sit upon Saul's throne. Many a poor man ceases to love his brother merely because that brother can now ride, while he himself is compelled to walk. Why do I state this truth? Because, my hearer, I want you to realize the reason you dislike some of the friends of your youth. It is not because they are untrue to you, but you are untrue to them. It is not because you have made a failure that they refuse to have anything to do with you. It is because they have made a success that you refuse to have anything to do with them. Oh, the poisonous fangs of satanic envy! It is a fiendish enemy, which does its deadly work in the poor man's hut as well as in the rich man's palace.

The true friend is never "out of sight, out of mind." His love can be likened to the trembling movements of the magnetic needle. No matter which way the ship turns, that needle always turns towards the North Pole. No matter which way the true friend goes, his heart's needle always points towards his absent brother. It can be likened to the echoing voice of the phonograph. Some years ago, when one of the Arctic exploration parties set sail from its home harbor, the captain of the ship carried in his cabin a phonograph, into which his wife and little children had spoken loving messages. Thus, when the captain had reached the home of the whale and the polar bear, had reached the "Land of the Midnight Sun," "Land of the midnoon darkness," he heard there the voices of his dear ones, speaking as they were accustomed to do in his own sitting-room. The phonograph of the heart should have a faultless memory. No matter what we do, or how we should be absent from our friends, we should still be able to hear the old voices, and, as in a family album, be able to see the dear, loving lips, just ready to speak.

But, oh how easy it is to forget our absent friends. How easy to get careless about sending the tender salutations of affection which St. John sent to his beloved Gaius, when he wrote, "Greet the friends by name." How easy, when sickness comes, or death comes into the home, to neglect the written words of sympathy! When we are afar off, how easy, amid pressing cares, not to send the letter of encouragement and advice and warning, which would help keep that young man from turning to the left, into the path of sin, when he should keep straight in the narrow path of virtue. My brother, are you doing your duty, your Christian duty, to that absent friend? You know you had a mighty influence for good when you were by his side. Shall you drop that influence for good merely because you cannot touch his hand, or appeal to him except through the influence of the written page?

True friendship is proof, also, not only against absence, but survives death itself. The widow of your friend and his fatherless children, his brother and sister, and all whom he loved, will, if you are a true friend, have claims on you which you will recognize. When David became King of Israel, one of the first things he did was to send messengers through the length and breadth of his kingdom to see if there were any of Saul's family living, to whom he could show kindness, for his friend Jonathan's sake. One was found, a son of his dead friend. He was a cripple, and David took him and made provision for him in his palace. He did this for the sake of his dead friend. O brother, is there in your life a friendship that death has snatched? Was there some Jonathan who loved you, and whom you loved? Was there one who helped you when you were starting in business or who stood by you in your trouble? Perhaps that friend has left a wife who needs help; a son, who is struggling with the world; a daughter, who needs protection. Let your love go out to them in loving service. You can do nothing for them than, dead, but for those whom he loves better than his life, you may do much. How better can you prove yourself a true friend than by helping them for his sake? He may be awaiting them arrived in the land of blessed reunion, but there go there to tell him how your love for him brightened their lives.

Thus, the "Love After" is not to be a disregarded law. We should love the Lord our God with all our strength, and our neighbor as ourselves. But that does not mean all the members of the human family should receive the same sacred closeness in our hearts. Christ came to save a world, but Christ spent and spoke a thousand his way out of Jerusalem over the Judean hills to [illegible] Bethany with Mary and Martha and Lazarus, who were his true friends. Again, [illegible] he was when he entered on the "Last Supper," he [illegible] about him the twelve, even though he knew one of those was a traitor. These are intended hints [illegible] friends and friend. You should have [illegible] as Paul had those to whom he [illegible] them. We should have those [illegible] as with all on earth, however [illegible] friends with whom we can [illegible] and pray. [illegible] their presence and [illegible] cooler and wilder places we can [illegible] friends with are true to us, [illegible] Christ. Thus, I find [illegible] Gaius. CONSUL-GENERAL UCHIDA, NEW YORK

A PRETTY JAPANESE GATEWAY, SAN FRANCISCO

NEW YORK'S JAPANESE COLONY

By REV. CLAUDE M. SEVERANCE, M.A.

"MODERN war is so expensive that even victory doesn't pay. We want victory without fighting." This was the significant statement made to the writer at the Japanese Consulate, 99 Nassau street, New York, by Consul-General Sadatsuchi Uchida. To the question, "Will Japan go to war with Russia?" Mr. Uchida replied, "It is difficult to answer. Japan is prepared for war. The Japanese like to fight. The Japanese will not take the initiative; but they are ready to defend their rights at all times and in all places. They hold Formosa as the United States holds the Philippines; but they do not care for territorial expansion."

The New York Consulate was established some thirty years ago, and Mr. Uchida has been at this post for seven years. He has a wife and one child with him in New York. He is accessible and affable, the picture of health, with a vein of humor to modify his natural dignity and urbanity. At annual celebrations, by our Japanese residents, of the Mikado's birthday (November 3), his words as host are always well chosen and worthy the representative of an emperor, now fifty-one years old, who has ruled 40,000,000 of affectionate subjects successfully for thirty-six years. Mr. Uchida was made Consul-General in January, 1902. Up to 1895 there were only two consulates in the United States, but at present consulates are located at Honolulu, San Francisco, Seattle (with a branch at Tacoma), Chicago and New York. At Philadelphia, New Orleans and Galveston there are honorary consulates. It is estimated that there are 70,000 Japanese in the Hawaiian Islands, and 35,000 in the United States, from 1,500 to 2,000 being in Greater New York, making more than 100,000 under the United States flag. One of the most distinguished Japanese in the metropolis is Dr. Jokichi Takamine, the discoverer of "Taka-diastase," and president of the Hinode Club of New York City. Mr. S. Hirose is the vice-president, Mr. T. Takahashi secretary, Mr. T. Morioka treasurer, and Dr. Ugai, Mr. Ikeda, and T. Hirose are trustees. This club originally started as a bicycle club, but three years ago it became simply the Sunrise Club. Monthly meetings are held at a private Japanese boarding-house conducted by Mr. Kurata. It is expected that many visitors who will come from Japan to the Exposition at St. Louis will come on to New York. With this thought in mind, the club has appointed a committee to suggest a site on the west side of New York for a permanent Japanese club-house.

There are at present in New York forty-nine members of the wealthier class of Japanese. It is believed that a club-house, where Japanese may meet their fellow-countrymen, will tend to keep young Japanese from the sins of the city.

A JAPANESE NEW YEAR'S GATHERING IN BROOKLYN SEVERAL AMERICANS PRESENT

At No. 111 Nassau street, there is a Japanese General Agency, managed by Mr. Goroku Ikeda, editor of the first newspaper east of the Rocky Mountains in which movable Japanese type were used. According to his statement, there are eleven Japanese newspapers printed in the United States: In San Francisco, The New World (an eight-page daily), established in 1894, and The Japanese and American (another eight-page daily); in Seattle, Wash., The Peace (four-page daily), The North American Times (daily), The New Japanese (a weekly), and The Northwestern News (a weekly); Los Angeles News (a weekly); in Oregon, The Portland News (a weekly); and in New York, The Japanese-American Commercial Weekly, Japan and America (a monthly), and The New York Japanese Weekly.

The Japanese-American Commercial Weekly claims this distinction, that it "has a staff of nine thoroughly educated young Japanese, who act as interpreters and guides to business men from Japan who visit this country"; it "has a bureau of information for the purpose of furnishing information of Japan to Americans, and of America to the Japanese"; and its purpose is "to give the Japanese live information concerning American markets and trade." Mr. Fukutomi, the editor, has a wife and son in Japan. He was editor of the Asahi Shimbun from 1890 to 1894. From 1894 to 1897 he was the business manager of the Nichi-

Nichi (Times), at Tokyo. He is a Buddhist, and says he knows nothing of Christianity.

There are in New York a number of notable Japanese business firms dealing in art objects, raw silk, cotton, carpets, rugs, etc. One of the unique callings is tattooing. A "Tattooing parlor" has been opened in the metropolis, where experts, who have lived in Hongkong and Manila, do beautiful work. At the New York School of Art, one Japanese artist is a competitor with the American students. There are twelve or more restaurants and boarding-houses where Japanese food is served in part or exclusively. Boarders come and go constantly, lingering only long enough to make friends and secure employment. Some of them become despondent and reckless, spending their Sundays playing cards, smoking, shaking dice, and drinking sake, while others are converted, coming under elevating and Christian influences, and become models of good conduct and successful men of affairs.

In one of the Japanese clubhouses in New York, where some sixty Japanese congregate occasionally, there is a master of sword-dancing and fencing, Mr. Tenmaru Uchimura. There one can get a glimpse of real Japan.

Only in Sands street, Brooklyn Borough, can one think of the Japanese as forming a colony. About 500 make their home in that vicinity. The rest are scattered far and wide.

A good many Japanese marry American wives, but few of the latter ever go to Japan for permanent residence.

The Japanese welcome their fellow-countrymen with pleasant receptions, and cheer them at their departure with farewell words and generous gifts, in special assemblies, called sobetsukwai. At such gatherings, short solos are sung by the young men. The sword-dance, with a heartrending song and frightful posturing, enlivens such events. Sembei (a kind of cracknell or rice wafer), grapes, apples, bananas, cake and ice cream, as well as o cha (honorable tea), are enjoyed and used by all.

The city apartment, or house, seems more difficult to keep tidy than the low-roomed homes of Japan, which are swept and dusted daily; but even high ceilings and unmatted floors yield to the athletic and æsthetic housekeeper, and she converts a massive house into a place of stately simplicity and taste. The "little darlings" in a Japanese domestic circle are put early to bed, and tucked into their own little iron cribs—a boy in one room near his father's bed, and a girl in an adjoining room beside the mother, as the case may be. Japanese children go to the public kindergartens and their parents encourage them to master English, secretly planning to take them back to Japan at a suitable age, for a thorough education in Japanese.

A Japanese lady receives more consideration here among her fellow-countrymen than in Japan. If she has been in America for years and has had college advantages, or rare privileges of another nature, and marries a Japanese less familiar with our country and our customs, she receives a respect and deference from him, public and private, akin to that shown the average American lady. Americans who have known such ladies have found them sometimes model Christian women, exemplary in every regard. They lose their shuffling gait, become graceful in Western costume, and have a self-respect that is wholly new to new Japan.

JAPANESE STUDENTS AT YALE'S 200TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Moto, an Americanized Japanese, in reply to various questions, said: "Before the Chino-Japanese war the majority of the Japanese came to America for education, but since that war, many come here to make money. Many are now sending money back to Japan."

At No. 17 Concord Street, Brooklyn, there is a Japanese Christian Home, which has been the scene of many conversions. Mr. J. H. Tsutsumi, a Japanese business man, piloted this enterprise successfully several years, raising funds from Japanese for the work. For years the Rev. A. C. Dixon and members of his church gave liberally of time and money for its support, but the Home has now passed under the control of the Methodist Church. A weekly prayer meeting is held on Thursday evenings. On Sunday, at 2 o'clock, there is a Sunday School, and in the evening a preaching service. The evangelist in charge, Mr. Ishikawa, goes every week to New York to conduct a service at 61 East 23d street, the home of Mr. Higashi, an importer. There is another Christian Japanese Home in Greater New York, where religious services are conducted. This is at 69 East 24th Street. Mr. Hosoi is the Missionary in charge.

Our Navy affords employment to a considerable number of Japanese, as stewards and in other capacities, especially on ships visiting Japanese ports. In the Brooklyn Navy Yard, there is one Japanese Christian, and twelve or more others in training, employed. An excellent religious work was done on behalf of Japanese sailors by the New York Port Society, under the superintendence of Rev. Samuel Ryde. In this Mr. Yoshio rendered useful service in the interpretation of the Gospel, starting a class of Japanese for instruction in English. Mr. Yoshio's name and address in this city for several years, until it was transferred to London. A notable service done for the Japanese in New York is that by Miss S. L. Crawford, who, fifteen years ago, opened a school for Chinese and Japanese on Fulton street, Brooklyn. More than one hundred students whom she has helped have been baptized, and many others she took as far only lacked baptism. Some have gone back to Japan, one graduating with distinction from our best institutions.

Mr. K. Miyagi, a lawyer and orator and evangelist, who has labored in Formosa, Hawaii, and America as well as Japan, and who is now in New York, addressed his countrymen one evening lately in these words: "Japan's greatest need is regeneration. Japan needs evangelization. To be Christian is more than to be rich. The present is a time of waiting in Japan. Young men preach Christ wherever you go! I come to this country and find that in all the great cities religious bodies are contesting as to means for saving the people. Up to 1885, there were not more than 200 Japanese in Hawaii. Today there are 75,000. They talk of the money they are saving. It is more necessary that they should talk of evangelization."

Considering the fact that there are about 1,000 Japanese in Greater New York who might be approached by Christians, very little is being done for them. Though they are courteous and teachable and have ample time for Christian instruction, they are not sought out individually and helped spiritually to any great extent. Many of them carry solemn impressions received from missionaries in Japan and they are wondering why there are not more real Christians in the United States to present the inspiration to holy living.

A PERILOUS MISSIONARY TOUR

1,500 Miles in the Saddle, through the Brazilian Wilderness, to Win Souls to Christ

REV. MR. AND MRS. YOUNG AND SON

FROM the Rev. R. J. Young and wife, American missionaries in Brazil, we have received this letter, giving encouraging reports of the progress of their labors in that country:

S. PAULO, Brazil, Oct. 30, 1903.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: We are very grateful indeed for the two remittances received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of $30, Sept. 10, and $10 Sept. 30, and wish you would express our hearty thanks to the friends who contributed.

God is blessing our labors here, and increasing the number of converts, as well as the number of churches. Our third year is now completed, and beginning our fourth with faith in the Lord, and anxious to obey his commission, we can now record to his glory, that we number about 350 truly converted persons, grouped in four different States. We have seven churches, all in good condition, and cared for by native pastors, all of whom have been brought to a knowledge of Jesus.

Several of these brethren have literally left business and houses, and lands, and all earthly ambitions, in order to preach the Gospel. Two have recently started out on an evangelistic trip to the capital of Matto Grosso—the largest State in the Union, and one absolutely without missionaries. These brethren—Sr. Camillo, and Sr. Theodora—are now journeying on horseback through wild forests, and over rushing rivers, and they hope, in about two months, to reach Cuyaba, the afore-mentioned capital. They will have ridden 1,500 miles in the saddle by the time they reach their destination.

On one stretch of country, they ride a hundred miles between houses, and they are obliged to carry enough provisions for themselves and animals, to last six weeks, while they pass through an uninhabited country.

By the time you receive this they will be in the midst of their dangerous pilgrimage, and we ask you to pray that God will protect them, and bring them safely and duly to the city of Cuyaba.

The enclosed photograph gives an idea of our missionary caravans, at a halting-place, where they are unloading the animals, and preparing a wilderness supper over the little camp fire.

A MISSIONARY PARTY ON THE WAY TO MATTO GROSSO

We also have workers in the hitherto unevangelized State of Ceara, the people of which listen gladly to the Gospel. We hope to send you good reports from the regions beyond as we go forward with the message of Salvation.

A Christmas Opportunity

CHRISTMAS-TIDE, full of sentiment and tender home memories, is drawing nigh, and the Bowery Mission, the Lighthouse for homeless, friendless and unfortunate men, is making gigantic preparations to bring a ray of sunshine and good cheer into the lives of the many thousands who, during the last week of the waning year, will put its open-hearted, open-handed hospitality to a severe test.

Depending upon the generous contributions of our readers, who have so liberally supported the Bowery Mission during the past ten years, we are arranging to serve daily a bountiful supper to 1,000 men and boys, commencing with Christmas eve and continuing until New Year's day. While the supper is in progress the Bowery Mission Quartette will sing, and Mr. Hallimond, our beloved Superintendent, and Mrs. Sarah J. Bird, the "Mother of the Bowery," who has given up her palatial home at Montclair, and taken up her residence on the East Side, in order that she may more entirely devote herself to the salvation of the hapless and homeless, will both speak words of comfort and good cheer.

On Christmas day the usual Christmas breakfast will be given to 5,000 men and boys, for whom the doors of the Mission will open at three o'clock in the morning, and remain open until all have been served.

During these nine days over 15,000 meals will be served, and we plead for 1,000 contributions of $1 each, in order that the vastly increased expenditures incurred thereby may not fall as a weight upon the Mission and hamper its usefulness.

Never was a more deserving cause presented to our readers, and we confidently appeal to them for help on this occasion.

If God has prospered you, give a mite to this grand work. It is very near my heart. I pray daily for the men and the boys at the Bowery Mission, and for the thousands of donors, unknown to them, to whom they are indebted. God knows the generous hearts which respond to these appeals for His wandering sheep, and He will surely bless and prosper them. May you and your dear ones be numbered among them.

Pleasant Times Before Us

WHEN the chilly winds of winter blow around the house, and the windows rattle, and the dead leaves go scurrying before the blast, there is a peculiar satisfaction in gathering around an open fire, or sitting cosily beside the table where shines the evening lamp. The cheer of a fire that one can see far surpasses that of warmth shut up in a stove, or coming in hot waves through a hole in the floor, or the wall. Later on, after snow and sleet come, when winter sets its iron grip on fields and roads, and the biting cold steals in through every crevice, we are glad enough to have the furnace in the cellar, its yawning mouth filled with anthracite, or own a big base burner that makes the house comfortably tropical.

The season brings renewed activity to church life, and to every social function and oppportunity in which friends meet and mingle, or Christian workers attack the forces of evil. Among the pleasant times ahead are sociables, in which young people will combine; fairs and bazaars are coming to stimulate good women to exertion, and afford a great deal of incidental enjoyment, and there will be concerts and lecture course, and many another chance for the improvement of the mind and the innocent amusement of evening hours. Besides these, there may just now be some domestic planning which will eventuate in agreeable affairs later on.

Young women, living in a place remote from a large library, may profitably organize little book clubs of their own. The method of doing this is very simple. Suppose that six or eight friends club together, each putting in a small sum towards buying the first books. Once a fortnight, or once a week, books may be exchanged. No officer is needed except a secretary and treasurer, who may be combined in one young lady. A small monthly due will go to the purchase of new books, and at the close of six months the books on hand, having been the rounds, may be auctioned off, thus giving a fund for the purchase of books next year.

Another pleasant thing is a reading class, which does not necessitate the purchase of new books. It may take up current events and assembling once a week, to a member may be assigned the duty of reading a paper, written by herself, on what is going on in the nation and the world. The others can discuss it informally, and the meeting may end with a cup of tea.

A historical class is intellectually very profitable, but to make it successful, someone must be found who will take the part of leader, map out the work and be responsible for the success of the class during the winter. Where there are several young people of musical tastes in the village, they may form a little musical club, and with mandolin, violin, piano, or banjo, or with singing, pass some pleasant evenings.

Still another charming thing is to have, now and then, a story-telling evening around the fire. This need not be confined to young people, since older people often have good stories to tell. With lights turned low, let the company gather around a bright fire, and one by one relate tales of adventure, or fairy lore, or some remembered anecdote, or incident of childhood.

With a view to keeping the boys out of mischief, and interested in safe and legitimate pursuits, the young women may devise evenings in which they can join. The ideal pleasant time must always include both sexes, just as the ideal club, if it is ever formed, will be a club for husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, men and women, with common tastes and sympathies.

An Encouraging Thought

IF any work is of the Lord, and if it is in the hands of those who are laboring, not for self-glorification or emolument, but with a single eye to God's glory and the betterment of mankind, that work will inevitably prosper.

It may encounter reverses, and at times it may seem as though it would be totally submerged by the waves of misfortune; but if it be of the Lord, it will surmount all difficulties, and will triumph in the end.

No human agency can permanently thwart a work if it is of God. He will acknowledge it before the world and will establish it on foundations that cannot be moved. Moreover, he will supply it with all needed resources. But His ways are not as our ways, and He may not do this after the manner we are naturally led to expect; but do it He will, nevertheless. At the last, it will shine gloriously before men, divinely acknowledged and blessed, to the confusion of its enemies.

Any needed work which is begun for the glory of God and the furtherance of his kingdom, and without a trace of selfishness on the part of the founders, will realize this blessing. To those who are laboring in the great Gospel field, or in any field of Christian philanthropy, either at home or abroad, and especially to those who have thus far seen little results from their efforts, this reflection comes as a grand spiritual consolation: the work is the Lord's; He will not let it utterly fail. When the time is ripe for Him to own it, it will broaden and deepen, and produce a bountiful harvest.

Nothing, therefore, should make the founders of such a work ashamed. Let them persevere in faith and confidence, waiting upon God, for the blessing is sure in the end.

God Training Our Faith

GOD often deals with you very much as you do with the baby on your knee, when you lift above his head the thing he wants, and hold it for a while out of reach of his hand, not to tantalize him, but to train his eye, and to teach him the use of his hands and to exercise his limbs.

There is nothing which delights our Heavenly Father more than such faith in his goodness and love and power as will persist in its demands, and even increase its demands as difficulties and obstacles rise in the way. Did you never sit in your chamber and smile with love and pleasure as you listened to your little child, creeping on hands and knees up the stairs to see you, panting with the effort yet undismayed by the difficulty, and even crowing with delight, knowing well that the moment of triumph and joyous welcome was sure to come?

So, be sure, our Father in heaven smiles, amid the clouds and darkness which sometimes are around about him, to hear the feet of faith coming steadily up the hill of Difficulty, never slacking their pace, but strong and exultant in the knowledge that there is light above the clouds.

To Save Other Feet from Stumbling

WE have the spirit of Christ only so far as we stop to consider whether what we do or leave undone, will affect for good or for evil some other soul, will tend to lift up, or to drag down some one else, for whom Christ died. If we cannot prove our relationship to Christ in any other way, we can do it by taking up the stumbling stones, the things that would hurt and destroy, out of the way of others.

A poor woman, crossing one of the public parks, suddenly stopped and picked up something which she concealed in her apron. A policeman saw the act and followed her. She was ragged, and her furtive manner convinced him that she was making off with some article of value, such as is frequently dropped by accident in public places. He called to her roughly:

"Here, what have you got in your apron?"

His threatening official tone frightened her, and she made no answer. Feeling sure that she had hidden a pocket-book or a jewel, he ordered her to show what she was trying to carry away, or he would arrest her. Then the poor woman timidly unrolled her apron, and revealed a handful of broken glass. The policeman stared at it a moment, and muttered:

"What in the world do you want with that rubbish?"

"I just thought I'd take it out of the way of the children's feet," she said meekly.

Whether she knew it or not, that woman put a gospel of love into her humble deed. She obeyed in spirit the Divine command to the ancient prophet, "Take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people." It was the very same love which only takes a higher range when it gives itself concern for the deeper, the spiritual, the eternal welfare of our fellow-creatures.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELISTS DAVIS and Depfer have just closed a successful work at Wyalusing, Pa., all the churches co-operating.

—REV. J. J. RINGER, with his singer, Mr. J. Owen Long, has just closed a successful Gospel meeting at Lacey Spring, Va. A number have been added to the churches.

—REV. EDWIN S. STUCKER, of the Baptist Church and Academy at Owatonna, Minn., lately conducted union evangelistic services with the Methodist, Presbyterian and Baptist churches of Grand Forks, N. D.

—REV. J. R. CULPEPPER and his son, Rev. O. B. Culpepper, lately closed a series of three weeks' services in Columbus. A number of conversions are reported, and there were many accessions to the various churches.

—THE PRESBYTERY of Ouachita has been engaged in special evangelistic work in the mountains of Southwest Arkansas, and sent Evangelist J. D. Fleming with a tent on a mountain campaign. Conversions are reported. A Presbyterian church was organized at Kirby, a town without any church building at all, and a lot has been obtained on which to erect a house of worship.

Who Will be Their Santa Claus?

Dear Mother Bird, of the Bowery Mission, intends to gladden the hearts of 1,000 East Side children, to whom Santa Claus will bring no toys on Christmas day, and she asks for $250, or twenty-five cents for each child, to help her carry out her very commendable intentions. Surely, the tens of thousands of our readers who have learned to love "Mother" Bird for her life of self-sacrifice, will stand by her in this effort to bring light and sunshine into these young lives, and with no misgivings as to the outcome, we boldly appeal in her behalf.

Send your contribution for Mrs. Bird's Christmas Tree in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Every contribution will be thankfully received and promptly acknowledged in our columns.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

A Historic Building Burned

FIRE has removed from the city of Brooklyn one of its most famous structures, which had many historic associations. On Nov. 30, workmen were busy in the Academy of Music preparing the interior for a grand political dinner, when an electric fuse blew out. Almost immediately the drapery over the stage blazed up. The workmen did their utmost to extinguish the flames, but they soon realized that the attempt was hopeless, and that if their lives were to be saved they must run. There was a general exodus from the burning building and an alarm was turned in. As generally happens when fire surrounds a large open space like the auditorium of the Academy, there was no hope from the beginning. The fire department worked gallantly, but its efforts were directed chiefly to preventing the fire spreading to adjoining buildings. In a very short time the roof collapsed, sending up a large eruption of sparks, which alarmed the occupants of the office-buildings on both sides of the street. Happily the firemen were able to save those houses, as well as several private residences in the rear. Only one life was lost, and that not in the Academy itself, but in a neighboring restaurant. It was that of a man who was struck down by a burning fragment, while he was helping to remove furniture and valuables. In less than two hours a heap of smoking debris and a few swaying walls were all that was left of the famous structure. It has had an eventful history. It was opened in January, 1861. At one of the assemblies, the attack on Fort Sumter was first announced to the public from its stage. During the years that followed, many patriotic meetings were held within its walls. A huge fair in aid of the Sanitary Commission was held there in 1864, which netted $300,000 for the soldiers. Later, Henry M. Stanley was welcomed there, after his famous journey in search of Dr. Livingstone. Henry Ward Beecher was a familiar figure on its platform, and it was there that the great celebration of his seventieth birthday took place. After the burning of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, in 1889, Dr. Talmage preached there to audiences which filled the huge auditorium to the roof. The building cost $150,000, and as it was not insured, the loss falls on the shareholders. It had been the practice of the directors to insure, but two years ago, the insurance companies, recognizing the insecurity of the risk, asked so large a premium, that the directors refused to continue insuring. It is expected that it will not be rebuilt. The site is very valuable, and will probably be sold for a sum large enough to reimburse the shareholders for their loss. It was a providential thing that the fire took place at the time it did. Had it occurred on one of the many occasions when the building was crowded, a large loss of life could not have been averted. It is natural to feel regret for the loss of a building identified with the labors of so many great and good men, but after all, the real memory of them is enshrined, not in an edifice, but in those who have known and loved them. It is so with the reverence Christ desires in his people. His real temple in which he desires to dwell, is not a visible church, but the hearts of his followers.

Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the highways to Zion (Psalm 84:5 R.V.)

Victims of Newyorkitis

The case of a Russian woman who came to America recently, and occupied a room fronting on Second avenue, New York, has evoked from physicians an expression of opinion on the effect of city noises on certain constitutions. The woman, who had spent all her previous life in a country district in Russia, became highly nervous here, and complained of the distressing effect of the continual noises that she heard day and night. Her trouble increased, until she became demented. One of the physicians consulted, said that her complaint was similar to that from which boiler-makers sometimes suffer after working for a period inside a boiler in which rivets are being hammered. It was a distinct disease, to which he gave the name of Newyorkitis. A person accustomed to quietness, coming to New York, is startled and shocked by sudden and unexpected noises. The shouting of teamsters, the clang of automobile gongs, the ringing of the bells of trolley-cars and bicyles, and the continuous rush overhead of the elevated cars, combine to produce distraction and a complete breakdown of the nervous system, which, in sensitive temperaments, is liable to end in acute mania. Such cases were increasing in number with alarming rapidity. So, too, are the cases in which the harass and worry are not physical but mental, and these are even more numerous than the others. The penalties we pay for the highly-civilized life we are living are becoming daily heavier, and so few of us avail ourselves of the inner peace which would be the most effectual remedy.

When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble (Job 34:29).

A Burmese Festival

The accompanying picture of the sacred bird known as the Garuda, was taken recently for The Sphere, when, at the annual celebration, it was carried in procession to the Buddhist temple at Kyaukse, near Mandalay, in Upper Burmah. The temple stands on the summit of a high hill which the people reach by a winding path. Steps are cut in the steepest parts out of the solid rock. Nearly the whole population, attired in their most brilliant garments, ascends on the day of the celebration to the pagoda. Even the aged and infirm make the painful journey, as they believe they acquire merit by worshiping there on that special day. The procession has almost a childish aspect, owing to the sacred objects it carries. These are chiefly symbolical. They are elephants and other animals made of bamboo and colored paper. When the procession reaches the pagoda, all the objects it has carried are reverently destroyed. The Garuda is a species of eagle, which, according to Buddhist tradition, is the principle of good perpetually at war with the principle of evil, typified by a snake. It is surrounded by musicians and dancers and is the chief spectacle in the procession. It is sad that, recognizing as the Burmese do, under the emblem of the bird's conflict with the snake, the struggle between good and evil, they do not know of Him who won the victory and gives his people power to win it, too.

THE SACRED BIRD OF BURMAH

5,000 Degrees of Heat

An extraordinary demonstration was given a few days ago before the American Society of Mechanical Engineers by Prof. Goldschmidt, of Essen, Germany. By combining oxygen with [illegible] he produced a heat so intense that it could not be registered by any thermometer. [illegible] was proved to be more than five thousand degrees Fahrenheit. The tools of the professor [illegible] a mixture so much that [illegible] he had a certain quantity on boiling point as cast steel. Almost instantly it burnt a hole completely through the plate. The industrial applications of electric arcs, of which were demonstrated on the platform, were extremely interesting. Balls and pipes were melted very quickly, and the results were as good. Judging from samples which had been placed, on the body of the metal. The fusing of masses of iron by thermit might be more appropriately carried [illegible]. It was a matter of curiosity that the operator, after pouring from a ladle the molten metal, took in his naked hands the vessel in which this metal had just been effected and turned its glowing mouth to the audience to show the [illegible] interior. This is another of the discoveries which show what immense resources there are in nature unsuspected before, by which such universal destruction as we have described may be brought about.

The American Bible Society has made a special note and the announcement that there will be no year out, no date, no and the books that are thereto issued be issued up (1) letter 5 cts.

Profit From Death

An extraordinary traffic has been discovered at Bayonne, N. J. A man who had been drinking in a saloon in that town, had a quarrel with another man soon after leaving the saloon. It ended in a fight, in which he was killed. It was then found that the keeper of the saloon held a policy on the life of the man who was killed. The publicity given to the case led the insurance companies to make an investigation, from which it was found that a large number of policies on the lives of drinking men were held by saloon-keepers. One saloon-keeper had insured the lives of nearly a hundred of his customers, and had collected payments in claims on the deaths of some of them. In most of the cases the men insured were aware that a policy had been issued on his life, and that the beneficiary he patronized would derive benefit by his drinking himself to death. The problem the insurance companies are trying to unravel is how a man could be insured without making an application and undergoing a medical examination. That problem concerns them, and they ought not to have much difficulty in solving it. The significant feature of the affair, to the certainty the saloon-keeper has of the early death of the victims. He betrays his consciousness of the fatal nature of his trade. A drinking man is liable to be killed in a quarrel, or to die by a fall, or, at the worst, to be killed by alcoholism. It is an outrage that a man knowing this should be allowed to go on destroying men and [illegible] to derive profit from the result of his pernicious work. As the good Book says, the victims have less sense than the birds.

Search in vain is the one spread in the nets in any bird's sight.

The · Macedonian · Refugees, · as · I · Saw · Them

By REV. M. N. POPOFF

A CROWD OF MACEDONIAN REFUGEES AT THE RILO MONASTERY

ABOUT the middle of last August Macedonian Bulgarians began to cross over the mountains in large numbers into free Bulgaria, as refugees. They kept coming over to Bulgaria until, in the latter part of October, their number reached twenty-five thousand. Advices received from Bulgaria recently, state that the number of refugees is daily augmented.

Being in Sofia during the latter part of October, and having been urged by my friends to come to America to solicit aid for these unfortunate sufferers, I decided to go and see personally about twenty-five hundred of them at Rilo Monastery. Knowing the severity of the climate in the mountains in October, I provided myself with a winter overcoat and wraps, and, indeed, I was not mistaken in making such a provision.

I saw the first refugees as I was about to enter the city of Dubnitza. It was about sunset. The air was chilly; but there being no place for them in Dubnitza, they had gone out of the city, to pass the night in the open air. In the city, I learned that next day they were to be taken and distributed among the villages along the road leading to Samokov.

The city of Dubnitza was crowded with refugees. Everywhere on the street were groups of these poor Razlog villagers. I stopped by a group who had just arrived. One, an old woman, told me, "This is the second time that I came to Dubnitza as a refugee. The first time was in 1879, after the Russo-Turkish war."

(The writer of this, as a boy, was himself a refugee at that time in Dubnitza.)

"Then," she added, "our home was not destroyed and we returned; but now all our earthly possessions are destroyed."

My heart ached when I saw these people, exhausted, hungry and thinly clothed, strangers among strangers. The next day others began to arrive. It was a pitiful procession. A woman had on her back a bundle of wool which she had prepared for winter clothing. Very wisely had she taken that as the most necessary article for a cold climate. Some had succeeded in taking with them a home-made blanket and a few other domestic articles; but the majority barely escaped with their lives. I saw men who had lived comfortably at home, so far as there can be comfort in Turkey, but who now were reduced to beggary. On the inquiry, whether they would like to return to Turkey in case the Sultan should restore their burned homes, the answer of some was that they would by no means go back so long as their country remained under the same tyranny; others replied that they would gladly return, for they were not accustomed to be beggars.

On resuming my journey in the afternoon, I met over five hundred more refugees. Many women had traveled all the way from the monastery, about fifty miles, barefooted, and carrying burdens on their backs and babies in their arms. Among them was a priest. I approached him to learn the cause of the flight. He said, "I fled from Turkey just a year ago, having been suspected as a dangerous man for the empire, and now I have come out to meet my family. We are ruined."

Mr. Gligor Wrukoff, another refugee, had similarly gone out to meet his family, but to learn, to his great regret, that his two eldest sons were killed in Mehomia, while nobody could tell him where the remaining seven children and his wife were, or whether they were alive or dead.

In the monastery itself I found over fifteen hundred refugees. Aside from the refugees, about eight hundred Bulgarian soldiers were quartered there. In a large room outside of the monastery, built for a saloon and restaurant, over thirty families of refugees were quartered. In a small church were quartered about fifty families from one village.

As I wanted to photograph the refugees, I requested a policeman to get them together. He told me that I must go first to the bivouac. This was a settlement of about forty families of refugees in the open air, not far from the monastery. It was a heartrending scene: children crying from cold and hunger; mothers bathing their children and washing the only change of clothing; men groaning and lamenting over lost property, etc. A number of women were delivered of children during their flight on the mountains, where they had nothing with which to wrap the newly born babes. Many bore signs of the pursuing enemies, in the shape of a wound or a bullet-hole.

If these people are not taken care of this winter, they very likely will die before spring of hunger and cold, which sometimes is even worse than death by the yataghan.

M. N. POPOFF.

Revs. M. N. Popoff and D. N. Furnajieff will be ready to address meetings in churches and halls if invited. As personal witnesses of the sufferings of the Macedonians they can tell a thrilling story. Churches or societies wishing to hear them, may address them at Room 106, Bible House, New York. They are operating under the auspices of an American Committee for Macedonian Relief, which consists of the following well-known gentlemen: Rev. C. C. Creegan, D.D.; John S. Kennedy, Esq.; John P. Peters, D.D.; Bishop Edward G. Andrews, D.D., LL.D.; Hon. Seth Low, LL.D.; William H. Ward, D.D.; Henry O. Dwight, LL.D.; Charles H. Parkhurst, D.D.; D. J. Burrell, D.D.; J. Ross Stevenson, D.D., and the Rev. Robert Stewart MacArthur, D.D.

HOW YOU CAN HELP US

AT this season of the year, many families are considering what papers to read during the coming twelve months. You who know THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and would like to see it more generally introduced, can help us to increase our circulation this very week, by handing the Premium Supplement, consisting of the following eight pages, to some friend not now a subscriber, and speaking a good word in behalf of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. THE PANAMA TREATY SIGNED

NEWS that the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, had been signed by the Government of Panama, was received at Washington on Dec. 2. It now requires only the confirmation by the United States Senate to complete ratification. So far, events have moved rapidly, and the prospect of a canal being constructed across the isthmus is bright. The mission of General Reyes, who was sent by the Colombian Government to protest against our recognition of the independence of Panama, is evidently a failure. It is reported that he has declared that the whole Colombian people would fight to retain Panama, and that our interference would involve us in a struggle as terrible to us as the Boer war was to Great Britain. That threat, however, we can afford to despise. If the United States were considering a plan to conquer and annex Colombia, the threat might be relevant, but since we are proposing only to prevent Colombia coercing Panama, the problem is simplified, and is much easier of execution. Panama may have to discuss the claim that she should assume some portion of the Colombian debt, but that is not our affair. It will have to be a peaceable discussion, however, for all violence or invasion is forbidden, and Panama is secure under our protection. It is probable that the Colombian claims for money, or its equivalent, will not be recognized by Panama, since that State has already contributed for many years more than its share of the federal income, without receiving the benefit and consideration to which it was justly entitled.

UNITED STATES CONSUL-GENERAL GUDGER

It is satisfactory to learn that Germany has recognized the new Republic. Minister Bunau-Varilla, who represents Panama at Washington, received formal notice of the fact, and has acknowledged it by a visit to the German Embassy. Though a Frenchman, he has thoroughly identified himself with the interests of Panama, and he more than any other man has popularized that route for the canal in this country. He is an engineer as well as a diplomat, and has been associated with the isthmian enterprise for twenty years. Early in his career, he was employed by the French Government on its works for the development of Algeria and Tunis, planning and superintending harbor improvements and the construction of railroads. Later, he performed some difficult engineering feats in the Congo State. During his connection with the Panama canal enterprise, Mr. Bunau-Varilla has made important changes in the original plans, which tend to expedite the work. His marvelous skill, and the determination with which he sets himself to the solution of problems which have been declared insoluble, have won for him the soubriquet of the Napoleonic engineer. He is thoroughly convinced of the practicability of the canal, and his opinion is shared by every one who listens to his explanations. Panama is exceedingly fortunate in having a man so eminent, both as an engineer and a diplomat, for its representative in this crisis.

Training Native African Girls

...MRS. SHARPE'S 20 YEARS' EXPERIENCE IN INDUSTRIAL WORK AMONG THE LIBERIAN TRIBES

MRS. SHARPE AND TWO LITTLE AFRICAN PROTEGÉES

These children are native African princesses

AFTER twenty years of earnest work in Liberia, West Africa, Mrs. J. E. D. Sharpe has returned to this country for the purpose of interesting our people in her work of training the young girls of that land. Mrs. Sharpe is a woman of color, born and educated in the United States. She is a graduate of the Boston High School, and possesses much of that force of character and practical common sense that are so valuable in mission work. Few women know so well the needs of Africa, and the best means of helping its people. She was sent out to Liberia by the American Board of Missions, and while in Monrovia, the capital, she taught with success in the Liberian College. Many of her pupils, among them the president's daughters, are now wives and mothers of the leading families of Liberia. After her marriage to Mr. Sharpe, a leading sugar manufacturer of Liberia, she continued her earnest and active interest in the girls, and used her personal means for the education and uplifting of African womanhood.

Mrs Sharpe, after several years in Monrovia moved into the "bush," housing herself in a little thatched structure. Then she set about learning the customs, modes of thought, style of expression, religious observances and superstitions of that interesting tribe, the Golahs. So well did she succeed in reaching the heart of these people, as well as of the adjoining tribes, that she was perfectly safe in her work among them even during the tribal wars of the last four years. The native African she found to be extremely hospitable, dividing his last spoonful of rice with the stranger, and really carrying out the Gospel command about entertaining strangers." In her home in the "bush," Mrs. Sharpe hopes to establish a school for the industrial training of the girls of these tribes, where they can develop industrial skill, their possession of which is shown by the skill with which they now work with crude tools of their own fashioning. They do fine leather-work, weaving in designs with slender thongs of the leather in colors, making ornamental pocket-sheaths for knives, and many other articles. They weave by hand the fine cotton growing in the country, making strong cloth, for the coloring of which they use dyes from the native plants. Palms and grasses are also woven into articles for use.

Although agriculture is in its infancy in Liberia, Mrs Sharpe feels that the native girls could be taught truck culture and poultry raising, the preserving of pine-apples (which grow wild in great abundance), and of the mango plum. By these various means, the girls would be enabled to provide for themselves and to have suitable clothing, lack of which, especially during chilly rains, is the cause of great mortality among women.

Mrs. Sharpe now has a plantation of 650 acres, called Mount Coffee, but no suitable buildings. Her thirty little native girls had to be scattered because she had no house fit for them; but they are to be again gathered up, and their training resumed upon their return. Much of her hope of what may be done by industrial training, is based upon the respect the native African has for any one who can do good work. An instance of this is seen in the standing among the people of a famous Golah blacksmith. He had great skill in working iron, even with his crude tools, and he became in consequence, a great leader. To him the members of the tribe carried their "palaver" (the settling of their disputes), and he became the great man of his tribe. When he died, he was buried on a much frequented path—one of those picturesque little, zigzag paths found everywhere in Africa. A large lamp was brought and placed on his grave, which, to his people meant: "Here is a great light that has gone out!" Every passer-by places a stone on this grave.

Liberian children are very precocious, and learn English rapidly. This they use in their study and work; but at play, Mrs. Sharpe encourages them to speak in their native tongue, believing that it weakens a people to take their own language from them. These little ones are much loved by their parents, the maternal instinct being very strong in the native African woman. Young girls are carefully protected in most tribes.

"I feel convinced that the women must have more attention paid to their training, before any material advancement will be made," said Mrs Sharpe, to the writer. "That Africa, so far, has not produced anything that the world really needs, is not caused by lack of talents or skill, if rightly directed. I am trying to start a school where industries may be started, that will give some material support. There is nothing for the women to do, and to see them go through the rain with so little clothing, is pitiful. If industries can be started, the women will have clothing and food.

"I had a house full of little native girls, but I had to put them in Liberian families, because the house was quite unfit for occupation. We cooked in the shed outdoors, and studied verdants. The house was leaking badly. The rooms were large enough for women to crawl through before the girls could sleep. They lived in the most primitive way; but I was pained with the curious long strength to realize that they possessed possibilities for higher development. And just think the women of many of the tribes have not come in contact with civilization. They are ready for My Sword. I do not believe that women are ever considered.

"I never knew what prejudice was," continued Mrs. Sharpe, "until I went to Africa. I think that last conference phase of this question of the negro is the fact that we do not know enough about our ancestors. Pride of descent has played an important part in the development of the races. I have seen more in Africa than I have ever seen about it, except those in the great cities, such as the Mohammedans, Hottentots, Zulus and others. In the cultured race in America only those their African antecedents, instead of regarding themselves as being descended from savages or slaves that would have more self-respect, and would be encouraged to higher effort. My work is altogether for girls.

"Some of the directors, and those interested in my work, are, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Dr. James Smith, of the American Board, Miss Caroline Hazard, of Wellesley College, Mr. and Mrs. J. ZION CITY'S RECEIVERSHIP

ON the application of creditors, made before Federal Judge Kohlsaat, of Chicago, Ill., Frederick M. Blount and Albert D. Currier, were appointed on Dec. 11, as receivers in bankruptcy for all the property of John Alexander Dowie, in Zion City, Ill. The receivers at once took charge of the property. They were instructed by the court to continue all the Zion industries and enterprises, except the bank, and to report their condition to the court. They were also directed to take such measures as were best calculated to avert distress among the laboring class, whose available means are tied up in these enterprises, and whose money is represented almost wholly by the Zion Bank scrip. It was believed by the attorneys who represented the receivers, that the creditors would ultimately receive one hundred cents on the dollar.

The liabilities are estimated as follows:

Lawsuits (approximately), $64,000; salaries of Zion, $40,000; payments on C. O. D goods, $10,000; mortgages, due on Jan. 1, $120,000; dividends on lace company stock, due on Jan. 1, $20,000; dividends on candy factory stock, due on Jan. 1, $20,000; dividends on general store stock, due on Jan. 1, $20,000; dividends on Builders' Association stock, due on Jan. 1, $20,000. Total, $355,000. Assets are estimated at $25,000,000.

The recent crusade in New York, including transportation and all expenses, cost, as estimated, $200,000, of which the General Overseer personally paid at least $25,000 from his own resources.

Concerning the receivership and the present situation, Mr. Dowie makes the statement:

SON OF DAVID AND SON OF GOD ❋ CHRISTMAS LESSON

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR DEC 27
MATTHEW 2: 1-12

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT—JOHN 3: 16: "GOD SO LOVED THE WORLD THAT HE GAVE HIS ONLY BEGOTTEN SON"

MATTHEW begins his life of Christ with his birth, setting in the foreground that picture of His Kinghness—the coming of the wise and great of far-off lands to greet him as the World's King—"of the Jews"—defining his origin, not his kingdom. Mark begins his life of Christ with his baptism, the inauguration of his public ministry. There is no Christmas in his brief Gospel.

Luke begins his life of Christ before his birth, with the Annunciation, putting into the foreground in his picture the humanness and humaneness of Christ by emphasizing his swaddling bands, and his lowliest of cradles, and the coming to him of the lowliest of toilers, the shepherds. There is no abiding solution of the problems of poverty except upon the pattern that was set at Bethlehem, the coming down of the lofty to the lowly, to lift them up by personal fellowship, by lending a hand, and by the proclamation of the good tidings, the Gospel, to the poor.

John's life of Christ begins much farther back than Luke's. He notes the fact that John the Baptist, who was born six months before Christ, once said of his Divine Cousin, "He was before me," and that Christ himself said, "Before Abraham was, I am." John opens his memorabilia of Christ not with Bethlehem but with the beginning, and emphasizes, not his birth into this world, but his coming from heaven. John is not alone in proclaiming that Christ was in heaven before he was in Bethlehem.

Matthew calls Him "Immanuel," that is, God with us, and the star in the sky proclaims whence he came. So the song in the air in Luke's nativity proclaims him Lord of the angels. Mark's opening chapter pictures him as the Son of God.

"WE HAVE SEEN HIS STAR IN THE EAST"

Peter, in his first epistle (1, 20: 21), says that Christ was "foreknown before the foundation of the world, but manifested at the end of the times for your sake, who, through Him, are believers in God." Paul proclaims as the faithful saying that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners;" that "He was manifested in the flesh" (I. Tim., 3: 15, 16); that "Since the children are sharers in flesh and blood, He also in like manner partook of the same" (Heb. 2: 14–17), and in Philippians 2: 5–7 we have the picture of the same front steps to the palace of heaven that Jacob saw, only instead of angels ascending and descending between Jacob asleep on the pillow of stone and the front door of the palace of heaven, it is Christ whom we see descending, disrobed of his glory, to the stone manger of a lowly infancy, and as we look more carefully, we behold a step lower still, the rock of Calvary's cross, and instead of angels ascending, we behold Christ returning up those steps leading back to heaven a countless host, for whose rescue he came down to the manger and the cross. There is an ancient Persian legend, which tells us that for many years the Magi had twelve men stationed on a mountain watching for the star that would herald the birth of the Great One. At last it appeared; in it was the form of a child; over it a cross.

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son." Thus Christmas began in heaven with loving and giving, which are on earth also its very heart and soul. Heaven celebrated that first Christmas by sending down the Son of God to carry joy and peace to sad and sinful men. When the vanguard of Christmas reached the earth, as the angel suddenly stood beside the astonished shepherds of Bethlehem, his message was, "Behold, I bring a Saviour, joy, peace." The revision sheds new light on the gift which the angels proclaimed in song: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men, in whom he is well pleased."

For a man to celebrate Christmas with songs and decorations who is not in loyal submission to the law of Christ, is as absurd as for a man in revolt against our government to decorate his house with national flags and sing The Star Spangled Banner on the Fourth of July. Think of the absurdity of a Christmas dinner with no grace or doxology before it—a Christmas dinner with Christ left out! What right has the inn that had no room for the infant Christ to celebrate his birth? Or the heart that has no room for the royal Christ? Only to hearts that are mangers to receive him do the angels bring true Christmas joy and peace.

Will you not, at this Christmas season, by submission to the Christ-King, receive the peace he brings to men in whom he is well pleased, nay, more, the Prince of Peace Himself?

"O plodding life! crowded so full
Of earthly toil and care!
The body's daily need receives
The first and last concern, and leaves
No room for Jesus there.

O busy brain! by night and day
Working, with patience rare,
Problems of worldly loss or gain,
Thinking till thought becomes a pain—
No room for Jesus there.

O throbbing heart! so quick to feel
In others' woes a share;
Yet human loves each power enthrall,
And sordid treasures fill it all—
No room for Jesus there.

O sinful heart! thus to debase
The being God doth spare!
Blood-bought thou art! no more thine own;
Heart, brain, life, all are his alone—
No room for Jesus there.

Lest soon the bitter day shall come
When vain will be thy prayer
To find in Jesus' heart a place;
Forever closed the door of grace,
Thou'lt gain no entrance there."

Christmas reminds us that the eternal life Christ brings is a gift, not an attainment to boast of, but an *ob*tainment for which to praise God. "Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift." A beautiful answer was once given by a little girl in one of the London Homes for the Destitute. The question was asked why Jesus is called an "unspeakable gift." There was silence for a while, and then, with trembling voice, this dear child said, "Because He is so precious that no one can tell all His preciousness." "He that spared not His own Son but freely gave him for us all, how shall He not with Him freely give us all things?" (Rom. 8: 32). No good gift can be had without Christ, and no gift is good without him. The angel song has already suggested that true joy and peace come to men only with a Saviour. How can a man have "peace" while at war with God? But when Christ becomes a king whom we enthrone instead of resisting, then comes peace that passeth all understanding—a sense of security unspeakable under his sceptre of love and wisdom, and power. And the joy of having such a kingdom in the soul is the greatest that can be known on earth—a joy that includes God's approval, and the rare joy of self-respect, God-trust, and heavenly hope. The man who has the peace of those in whom God is well pleased will not lose it, because in seeking to please God he has displeased men.

The millionaire of stars became poor, born in a cave-stable at Bethlehem, reared in a cave-dwelling at Nazareth, and later than that having not even so much as a cave-home.

There is a legend that cattle kneel in stalls at Christmas. Well they may, for the Christ-spirit in men has wonderfully lessened cruelty to animals. In Norway and Sweden, sheaves of wheat are always specially preserved for the birds at Christmas, and this humane custom is still followed in some Yorkshire villages, where, on Christmas eve, a sheaf is suspended above the porch, while in Hertfordshire the first act of many a farmer on Christmas morn is to give good feed of hay to every one of his cattle. The Germans teach that every good gift comes with Christ, by representing Christmas gifts as coming from the Christ-child, which is true in a sense that children will grow to understand. They have a beautiful legend that on Christmas morning the Child that was born in a manger revisits the earth to look after all the other little ones; that from the little prince in his royal cradle, to the baby sleeping like Himself in straw none are left unvisited. The legend is but another form of the truth that Bethlehem has brought Christ forever near to the child-heart.

Those who are getting the largest Christmas joy in advance are those who are thinking, not what they are to get, but what they are to give, and giving cannot be well done without much thinking. "I am going to keep all my pennies," said little Kate to her sister; "I have fifteen in my bank and by and by I can buy a diamond cross for mamma. She will look so pretty with it on her black dress." "Mamma doesn't care for such things," said Emma. "But how do you know?" "Because the other day, when I asked her if she would not like to have a ring like that of Mrs. H., so beautiful and shining, she kissed me a great many times and said the only diamonds she wished for were those she saw in our eyes when good and happy." "Well, then, I will buy her some other presents," added Kate, "for I love her so much." "I think," said Emma, "that mamma does not care for presents; she would rather see us good. If we love her we must try to obey her always, and quick; this is what I mean to do."

It is related of one of the oldest and most respected professors of the University of Gottingen that he was at one time, not many years ago, presented during the Christmas holidays with a very beautiful and costly piece of silverware. The gift came from a rich American student, who no doubt, expected that it would give his master much pleasure. Such being the case, he was naturally much surprised to see his present returned. Greatly annoyed, and as he thought justly indignant, he asked for an explanation. This the old teacher gave in about these words: "I returned the piece of silverware very much as I would have returned its equivalent in money had you sent it to me. I did this without for a moment thinking the less of your kind intentions. Still I was obliged to do it in order to live up to one of my rules—that is, never to accept 'bought presents.' If you had made for me something with your own hands, I should have prized it highly; but I could not accept a gift in which there was embodied neither feeling nor sentiment, and which represented nothing but an extravagant outlay of money."

The Sunday Home Group

ROBERT BURNS, in an immortal lyric, has given us the picture of a devout Scottish cotter's home on Saturday night. The home group with us is often scattered on that last evening of the week. But the Sabbath, when its hours are drawing to a close, should gather the dear ones into a pleasant circle, and there should be song and cheerful talk, and the atmosphere of a feast and intimate fellowship, and finally a prayer, before the household separates for the night.

Our friends in Canada have their Sabbath evening services at seven, closing at quarter past eight o'clock. This affords a delightful opportunity for a home evening, after church is over. It would be well, if, in the United States, we could imitate this good example. The hour thus gained for the home would be very precious.

If possible, the home supper-table on the Sabbath should be set with an extra plate for any guest who may come, preferably for a guest who lives in a boarding house, and is far from her home, or from his. Many young girls and young men, at work in cities especially, are very lonely on the Sabbath, missing then, more than at any other time, the father and mother, and brothers and sisters, whom they so seldom see. To draw them into the glowing warmth of a real home on the Lord's day evening, is to bring them nearer the loving Jesus, and to give them a glimpse of his sympathy and friendship. The Sunday evening supper need not be elaborate, nor sumptuous. It is better to be simple, and mostly prepared on Saturday; but the delicate bread-and-butter, the thinly sliced ham, the golden cake, the amber preserves, fruit in lucent syrup, or jam with the flavor of peach or apple or plum, with hot tea or coffee, are a banquet, if served with gayety and kindness. Away with the thought that there is necessarily anything sacred in a long face and grave demeanor, touched with moroseness. The Lord's Day should be the beautiful day of the week, a day of rest and gladness not only, but a day of joy and mirth in the dwelling of the righteous.

The children should sit up later than usual, as a treat, on Sunday evening. Around the piano, all joining in the songs, should be a happy group, father, mother, the young people, the little ones, singing favorite hymns; secular music is for week evenings, and there is a wide range of choice in sacred songs to suit every voice and every taste.

After the singing, read aloud, of course, a chapter from the Book, without which the evening would be incomplete. Then let there be a half hour of happy conversation, and then, last, the good-night prayer.

Such a Sunday night at home starts the week well. All will rise on Monday in better heart for the strenuous labor of the week, after the benediction of so sweet a Sabbath day, thus rounded out with prayer and praise.

TIRED OUT

Tired out with watching,
Just a moment's rest,
And for nurse and patient
Sleep is surely best.

Health is coming swiftly
As the tide flows in,
Soon for nurse and patient
Good days will begin.

Our Never-Ending Battle

Dear fellow housekeeper, your never-ending battle and mine are waged with the persistent dust and dirt that sift in through crannies and lodge in corners; that come in the house on the feet of the family and friends; that are not to be exorcised when every time the furnace is shaken, the ashes fly in clouds of dust, that assail our patience and wear out our strength.

Do we worry over the dust more than we ought? Are we not over-scrupulous? Is a little mud on the doorstep on a slushy day a disgrace or only a slight misfortune? Are windows not quite brightly shining, a blemish in good housekeeping in stormy weather? May we not work too hard in the mere endeavor to have our homes perfect in every small detail?

The lazy and the shiftless allow dirt to get the better of them; but the energetic and the resourceful will always be somewhere on the winning side of the incessant warfare. Periodical cleaning, if thorough, will keep any home neat. Having attended to this, why be distressed because a little superficial dust floats in to remind you that you are mortal?

The Story of a Junior League

The brave Junior League who have this story to tell, belongs to Raton, New Mexico, and by hard work and faithful endeavor, they raised $158.41 for missions in ten months starting out to raise $100 and exceeding their aim by more than one half.

The young people held a monthly social meeting, and at this they turned in their earnings. At each social there was an entertaining programme, and prizes were given in the shape of small books to those earning a dollar or more. A gold medal and two silver medals were offered to those who raised the largest amount for the Lord's treasury by Oct. 1st, 1903. The good work began in the previous November. To the one who raised the largest amount of all was offered a gold watch.

One clever and persevering little girl won nearly all the prizes, as she earned $21.80. This went to the Children's Home at Council Bluffs, Iowa, by her special request.

All honor to the young people of Raton, New Mexico, and many congratulations to their earnest pastor.

That Headache

A WOMAN somewhat over sixty, observed the other day to a friend that she had never had a headache in her life. "Do you dream," said the friend, "that you are more fortunate than many a queen, that you have something for which to give special thanks every day?" The almost universal burden borne by women, growing out of and impressed by the word "headache." If it doesn't mean one of numerous varieties. There is the dull ache that comes with an iron band. There is pressure over the eyes, or a stabbing at the base of the brain, and sometimes the whole head is sick, and the whole heart heavy, while the shooting pains and the throbbing, growing and bursting torture, to which the sufferer is a victim.

A woman who endured pain for many years from the loss of supreme agony, and that her constant headache took a day to come on, a day to [illegible] and a day to depart, leaving her at the end of [illegible] a week. If she has a headache frequently, there must be some cause for it, which ought to be sought. It may be that it springs from the stomach and that improper diet or [illegible] are responsible. It may come from unequal rigor of the head, and a visit to an oculist to correct the astigmatism, may do away with the nervous headache.

From time immemorial, a headache has been a convenient social excuse with women of somewhat easy conscience, which there has been a tendency that they wanted to shirk. One finds out [illegible] sympathy with [illegible] aches, but for the real thing man's compassion is profound. THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "In His Steps,"

HOW much it cost Quits to say those words, "my brother," no one but God will ever know. For a single instant Jake Lawson hesitated. What was going on in his dark soul after that strange experience who can ever tell? Quits waited, praying that the miracle of the ages might be repeated in the man, but the moments passed, and then he turned, without a word, and went around the corner and out upon the street. Quits and George followed a moment later and saw, by the light of the street lamp, the saloon-keeper go in at the front door of his place. Then they went each to his own room, but George slept little that night, and more than once Quits waked to mutter the words, "Oh, God, save Jake Lawson! Save him by the power of the Cross!"

This event in Colby's history did not become public until months afterwards. Lawson had good reasons for keeping still about it, and gave explanations to his assistant for his sudden disappearance that night, saying he had gone down to the depot to see about his teamster. Quits never mentioned the matter until after events drew it out of him in a talk with Mr. Vernon. George promised Quits never to reveal the story of that night, and kept his word, although in other respects he was daily growing more and more unreliable.

What spirit of evil was at work upon the boy, Douglas despaired in his soul as he asked. Going home one night after a trying experience in the office, Douglas said to Esther—

"I'm afraid I'll have to discharge George. He is getting more and more unbearable."

"What! Discharge him! Oh, you can't do that, Frank! Think how much that would mean to him. You can't let him go!" There were tears in Esther's eyes as she spoke.

"But what can I do, Esther?" Frank spoke in desperation. "I have pleaded with him to let cigarettes alone. He's as nervous and irritable as a spoiled child. and there is no question now of his drinking. He came into the office one night last week under the influence of liquor, and spoiled several dollars' worth of job work for us before Quits discovered the errors. I can't afford to keep him with me."

"Are you patient with him?" Esther asked timidly. She did not know what else to say.

"I try to be. But what good does it do? I'm terribly disappointed in the boy. He has had a good chance in the office to make something of himself. He is smart, but he knows it too well! He is ambitious, but he hasn't sense enough to let either tobacco or beer alone; and it is a terrible humiliation to think that a boy who has been with the Beacon as long as he has, should go to the bad as fast as George seems to be going. If it had been some one in the Sentinel office it would not surprise me. But to have it happen in our office—why—it simply bewilders me, and, to tell the truth, it makes me feel bitter towards George."

Esther did not speak for a minute.

"Have you ever intimated to him that you might discharge him if he did not give up these habits?"

"No. I think he believes his place in the Beacon office is as secure as mine or Quits. He has grown to have the notion that he is indispensable; that we could not get along without his services."

"It does seem as if the boy had been helped a good deal," Esther said with a sigh, recalling the efforts Mrs. Edwards and Mrs. Vernon had made, together with herself, to invite George out to the church and to social gatherings with young people of attractive and helpful personalities, George always accepted the invitations, in fact he seemed to take them as a matter of course, but he had made no particular friends among these young people, and his preferences seemed to be with a doubtful crowd that frequented the hotel billiard hall and spent their Sunday afternoons riding over to Clinton, or loafing around the railroad depot.

Two weeks after this talk with Esther, Douglas came down to the office one night just as the papers were going to press, and found George with his hat on the back of his head, smoking a cigarette, and sitting on the office table, talking in a loud voice to one of the pressmen, who was at a case near the office door. He got down off the table as Douglas came in, but Douglas saw at once that he had been drinking. He did not stop smoking, and without any regard for Douglas except to nod and say good evening, he continued to talk boisterously to the pressman.

Copyright, 1923 by Charles M Sheldon.

"It's Too Late," Said Douglas, "You've Broken Your Promises Too Often"

A good many things had happened that day to irritate Douglas. We all have had such days, when the world seems full of ingratitude, and our little ship's crew of life have all mutinied and put the good captain in irons and the devil at the helm.

Douglas said coldly, "When you have finished that job on Edwards' dodgers I want to see you a few moments."

The way in which he spoke made George look at him hard, and he slowly took out his cigarette and threw it down on the floor. He went over to his case and finished his work and then came into the office.

"Here I am, Mr. Douglas," he said cheerfully, as he sat down.

There was not the remotest suspicion in the boy's mind, evidently, as to what Douglas wanted to see him for. And as Douglas looked at him and noted the handsome, attractive face (for the awkward, ungainly boy had developed into a promise of an unusually attractive young manhood), he hesitated to speak. When he did, it was with a softened tone, and he spoke slowly, as if to guard against yielding to anger.

"George, have you any complaint to make of your treatment in the Beacon office?"

"No, Mr. Douglas," George answered, in astonishment.

"Have you any complaint to make of Mrs. Douglas, or of me, or your friends here in Colby, who are anxious to see you succeed?"

"No, Mr. Douglas, of course not," the boy replied, in growing surprise.

"Do you think we have not done enough for you, to help you get on?"

"No sir, of course not. Nobody could have done more." The tears came into the boy's eyes as he replied.

"Yet you deliberately choose to do the very things that pain all these friends the most. You know there is nothing that all of us are working or praying for so much as for the temperance cause. We are trying in this office to fight the saloon out of existence. And you, in spite of all the friends who have, as you confess, done all they could for you, you go and add your share to the saloon as a patron of it; it is a common sneer in the Sentinel office. I am told, that you are so primed half the time that you don't know a galley proof from a case of sorts. What makes you do this, George; have you any reason?"

"Well, Mr. Douglas, the Sunday school and prayer meeting and church socials ain't in it with the other thing. They lack tang."

It was a very unfortunate attempt on George's part to exhibit his smartness. It had so often provoked a laugh in the Beacon office that he had grown to be vain of his tongue and the applause of the laugh.

Douglas shut his lips tight together and picked up a blue pencil on the desk, drawing meaningless lines with it on the blotter. Then he lifted his head and looked at George steadily.

"I'm sorry to say it, George, but the Beacon has no further use for your services. You may leave at the end of the week."

There was a long silence. George's face turned deathly white. Then he stammered out——

"Leave—leave—the Beacon?"

"It pains me to say it, but you have brought it on yourself. You have repeatedly promised me that you would give up the drink, and you have always broken your promises. We have all helped you in every way we can and you are altogether ungrateful. If you cared—"

"Oh Mr. Douglas, don't turn me out of the Beacon! I'll do any thing you say! I'll let you keep my wages and put them in the savings bank! I'll do any thing!"

"It's too late. You've broken your promises too often. I'll help you in any way I can to get something to do outside, but I cannot keep you on the Beacon any longer. So that's settled." Douglas turned to his desk, and George, still pale and trembling, stood irresolutely for a moment and then walked in a dazed fashion out into the press-room.

Before noon everybody in the office knew that the "old man" had given George his walking papers. He was the object of some commiseration from the force, but of more guying. He had made enemies through his foolish display of pertness and false pride, and the new galley-boy especially, did not disguise his pleasure.

Just before noon, Quits came into the office.

"Can I speak to you a moment, Mr. Douglas?"

"Yes, certainly," Douglas replied, knowing what he was going to say.

"It's about George. Clark says he heard you give George his walking papers. Is that so?"

"It is," replied Douglas, for the first time in his life losing his temper with Quits. But it seemed to him that Quits was assuming to question his right to discharge the boy.

"I wish you would give him one more chance, Mr. Douglas. If he goes out now, he will go right to the bad, I know."

"What's he been doing all the time?"

"I know he's done wrong. But what would we do if God did not forgive us seventy times seven?"

"I'm not God, and I've forgiven him enough it seems to me," Douglas said curtly.

Quits went back into the press-room without any more words, and Douglas went home feeling wretched over the whole affair, but not accusing himself any. It seemed to him that he had done the only thing he could do, and yet he was ready, if possible, to help George get another position.

About the middle of the afternoon George had finished some work and asked the foreman for an hour's absence. It was granted and without a word to any one he walked out, was gone just an hour, and returned to his case and quietly began again.

When Douglas entered his home that evening Esther met him with the exclamation, "Oh, Frank, George has been here this afternoon and told me all about it. He pleaded with me to ask you to keep him in the office. Can't you do it? Give him another chance. I'm sure he's penitent. It will simply ruin him to go out now."

SOCIAL LIFE IN MOROCCO

Missionary Weiss Describes the Quaint Marriage Customs of the the Moors

FAR away in the matter of distance from the home-land, the missionary often feels that he is still more widely separated by the contrast between the social customs surrounding him and those to which he has all his previous life been accustomed. This is pecuniarly so in Morocco, where, in spite of the proclivity of its ruler to foreign ideas, the people adhere tenaciously to their old habits and reverence the social traditions of their forefathers. It would, perhaps, interest your readers to know something of the home and family life of the Moors who are our neighbors here.

Children that are born in Morocco are more or less fondly and carefully nursed by their mothers. They are very seldom sent out to nurse. Only the motherless babies are fed with goats' or sheep's milk. The boy's education begins when he is four or five years old, and consists in his attending school, where a Foki undertakes to teach him to recite verses from the Koran, and does not shrink from stimulating his mental faculties with corporal punishment.

The boy's education over, his next business is that of marriage, which usually takes place when he reaches the age of twelve or fifteen years. The bridegroom-elect is not supposed to see his bride before the wedding, but he has means of becoming acquainted with the fact of there being a girl of marriageable age in some neighbor's family, and perhaps knows something of her appearance and character. The approach is made by the would-be husband despatching a friend to the father of the girl, who announces that a friend of his wishes to marry the daughter. The father then informs his wife of the offer, who, in turn, asks the girl, and she very seldom refuses. The father then asks the ambassador how much his friend will give, which depends very much on the circumstances of the two parties to the negotiation, some men paying twenty dollars or less, and some two hundred.

These preliminaries arranged, a month or so elapses before the marriage takes place. Seven days before the wedding day, the two principal characters in the approaching ceremony begin to entertain, the bridegroom inviting the male friends to drink tea and listen to music at his house, while the bride's mother entertains all the ladies of her acquaintance in her residence. Day and night, tea drinking is carried on, till the seventh day arrives. Then the bride, decked in fine raiment, is placed on the back of a mule or donkey, herself completely covered by a box, or frame, draped with rich silks and embroideries. In this she is conveyed, with music and lanterns, to the house of her husband. Here the procession breaks up, the girl entering with her female friends and relatives. She then proceeds to a room where her clothes are carefully arranged for her after her presents are in the box. She is seated on a divan, and tea is then served, after which the ladies retire, leaving the wife alone. Solitary she sits for some hours till midnight, when her husband, after being escorted around town on a horse, also with music and lanterns, arrives. The girl is seated, veiled, veiled, but on her husband entering, unveils herself.

Each time a man marries, this ceremony is gone through, though it is usually on a much finer scale at the first marriage than at his subsequent marriages. A man is allowed by the Koran four wives, but the number of slaves is not limited, and some richer Moors keep enormous harems. The rule, however, amongst the middle classes is one wife and no slaves.

There are a great many diseases in Morocco, and all sorts of incantations are used to effect a cure. A few charms, principally papers scrawled over with meaningless characters, or bags of salt and alum, are the sole means of curing and preventing disease. When a man dies he is wrapped in white linen and laid on a bier and borne by his friends and paid mourners, who go before and after the bier, singing. No coffins are used by the Moors.

The missionaries have done wonders in relieving the natives from pain and suffering by making journeys into the interior of the country, where they find people who are suffering from diseases that can be cured by simple remedies. The journey is made on the back of a mule, the animal chiefly used in traveling. On arriving a village the missionary pitches his tent, and the people come around to look at the stranger. He takes the opportunity of preaching the Gospel, and explaining to his hearers the principles of Christianity. Afterwards he talks with the people, and if any of them are afflicted with complaints for which he is able to prescribe, he gives them medicine. In this way he wins their confidence, and prepares the way for future missionaries.

May I ask the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for this distracted country, and for the missionaries who are trying to tell the people of Christ. It is a difficult task, for prejudice is strong, and the country is so disturbed by the conflict which still rages in the interior, that but little missionary preaching can be done. Your brother in Christ,

FRED WEISS.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Doctrine of "Blood Atonement" *

THE following story has in it all the elements of a tragedy:

A young Mormon missionary, seeking converts in England, meets and falls in love with a high-bred and very beautiful girl, who, full of enthusiasm for the new religion, consents to become his wife and to go with him to join the Mormon colony then being founded in Utah, by Brigham Young. It is not until they reach New York, that the missionary learns that polygamy has at last been declared a blessed practice among the new sect. He dares not reveal the truth to his wife. Together they journey with the other immigrants Westward, and it is only when their destination is reached that the blighting fact becomes known to the poor girl, that plural marriage was to be a basic principle of the Church. It is too late now for her to return; a little child has been born; the winter snows have imprisoned her in the midst of a life she loathes. The development of the story is absorbingly interesting; and both in his theme and his skill as a narrator, Mr. Alfred H. Henry is to be congratulated on his book, By Order of the Prophet. It is true to history; it is founded on actual incident, and presents a dramatic picture among the Mormons during the early days of their settlement. Talking of the power wielded by Brigham Young, the author says:

"To disobey was apostasy, and there was no epithet in all the vocabulary of the Saints more terrible than that of apostate. It meant excommunication, eternal banishment, social ostracism, ruin in temporal affairs, persecution, and often death. The doctrine of 'Blood Atonement' was no stage thunder in these days. It meant what it said—death to the apostate. In one part of the story the President openly threatens a man with death, 'with the air,' says the author, of a man who knew he could make good his word."

* By Order of the Prophet. Published by Fleming H Revell Co., New York. Price $1.50.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Letters and Addresses of Abraham Lincoln. (The Unit Book Series). 389 pp. (16 units). Price 46 cents. Howard Wilford Bell, 259 Fifth avenue, New York, publisher.

Aunt Jimmy's Will, by Mabel Osgood Wright, illustrated, a delightful story, holding the interest to the end. Pp 272, cloth. Price $1.50. Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

George Washington Jones: a Christmas Gift that went a-Begging, by Ruth McEnery Stuart; illustrated. This is a remarkably clever and amusing Christmas story, which all will appreciate, especially the younger folks. Pp. 147, cloth covers. Price $1. Henry Altemus Co., Philadelphia, publishers.

The One Woman, a story, by Thomas Dixon, Jr. Mr. Dixon has already made a name in literature and this latest book is one which has attracted much attention and encountered sharp criticism. Clever, realistic, and strongly dramatic. Price $1.50. 350 pages. Doubleday, Page & Co., New York, publishers.

Bethsaida, a tale of the time of the Cæsars, by Malcolm Dearborn. The tale deals with the period of the trial and death of Christ, and the Saviour appears in two of the scenes. Cloth binding, 301 pp. Price $1.50. G. W. Dillingham Co., New York, publishers.

World's Fair Fruits, an illustrated book, showing the various fruits from the extensive nurseries and orchards of the Stark Bros' Co., of Louisiana, Mo. The perfection of horticulture is here shown in a way to interest the reader and to awaken the enthusiasm of the fruit raiser. The Stark nurseries and orchards have branches in five States, headquarters being at Louisiana, Mo.

Corn Products and Their Purity, an address by Dr. T. B. Wagner before the National Association of State Food and Dairy Departments at St. Paul, Minn. Contains much information on the food question that is valuable to the consumer, and shows what an important position corn occupies as "the life and strength for all the nations."

The Religion of an Educated Man, by Prof. Francis Greenwood Peabody, of Harvard. Three lectures to the students of Haverford College, pointing out the message of Christ to the scholar. Pp. 80, cloth covers. Price $1. Macmillan Co., New York and London, publishers.

Songs and Stories of Mother, Childhood and Home, by Peter Philip Bilhorn. This collection contains all the old musical favorites in song and hymn, and many that are new—altogether a unique musical budget of "Home and Mother Songs." 80 pages. Price 75 cents. Bilhorn Bros., 53 Fifth avenue, Chicago, publishers.

The City of the King; What the Child Jesus Saw and Heard, by Mrs. Lew Wallace; illustrated: Jerusalem is an ever-attractive theme, and in these pages Mrs. Wallace has given us some very charming descriptions of that city, and also of Nazareth and Bethlehem. 97 pages, cloth covers; Bobs Merrill Co., Indianapolis, publishers.

The Interior of the Kingdom, by David Vaughan Gwilym. The heavenly kingdom is here meant, and this book, in the words of the author, describes "the internal riches and grace of the kingdom and their practical application to daily life." Spiritual and refreshing. 132 pages, cloth binding. Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York, publisher.

Problems of Living, by J. Brierly, B.A. "In these pages," says the author in his preface, "I have treated the human problem, both in its individual and social aspects, as essentially a transcendental one." And this, we take it, furnishes the key to the book. 356 pp., cloth. Price $1.40. Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York, publisher.

A Little Brother to the Bear, by Wm. J. Long. A delightful volume of nature study, with observations and sketches drawn from an experience of thirty years among the wild folk. One of the most attractively-illustrated books of its class. 400 pages, decorative cover design, cloth, $1.50. Ginn & Co., Boston, publishers.

Poems of Tennyson, edited by Henry Van Dyke and D. Laurance Chambers, A. M. One cannot wish for a better guide to the beauties of the famous English poet than Dr. Van Dyke. No critic is so well able as he, to discriminate between true poetry and mere tinsel, which is a capacity needed in a study of Tennyson. That he is a worshiper is true, but he is not a blind worshiper. His introduction is a fair and reasonable characterization, and after reading it, a true estimate of the poet's genius and a clearer appreciation of his work will be formed. The selections from the mass of his poems has been made with judicious skill, and enables the reader to see the various stages of the poet's literary development. Two editions of the book have been prepared. One of them, a library edition with uncut edges elegantly bound, containing the Introduction and one hundred and thirty-six selections. Price $2.50 net. The other, bound in cloth, and intended for the use of students, contains, in addition to the Introduction and Poems, a summary of the leading characteristics of the poems, a classification of metres and copious notes. Price $1. Published by Ginn & Company, New York and Boston.

The Deeper Teachings of Plant Life, by Hugh Macmillan, D.D., F.R.S.E., etc. One of the most charming books we have seen on the wonders of plants. It is not a botanical work, describing in scientific language the classification of trees and flowers, but a popular treatise, dealing with facts in relation to them of the deepest interest, and not generally known. The author chooses the phenomena which are best adapted to teach moral lessons, but these all come so naturally and so pointedly that the delightful information imparted serves its didactic purpose simply and gracefully. The marriages of plants, the poetry of plants, and the cruelty and selfishness of plants, are among the traits described. The chapter on the Brazil nut is especially striking. It is a valuable book to place in the hands of young people, though no thinking person is too old to enjoy it. Pp. 386. Price $1.20. Published by Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York.

The Evolution of the Japanese, by Sidney L. Gulick. A long residence in Japan has qualified Mr. Gulick to speak authoritatively on the present condition of Japanese society. He has been an acute and careful observer, and in this work tells us precisely the traits and characteristics most interesting to American Christians. He is impartial, too, and is not slow to recognize merit in Japanese character and customs. Among the subjects treated are: The Problem of Progress; Sensitiveness to Environment; Love for Children; Marital Love; Æsthetic Characteristics; Philosophical Ability; Moral Ideals; Religious Phenomena; Conceptions and Practices; The Buddhist World-View; Communal and Individual Elements in the Evolution of Religious Life; and The Essential Characteristics of the Orient. From all these, and others of equal interest, we gather a conception clearer than we have ever gained from any other work, of the forces which have developed the new from the old Japan, and a logical forecast of the effect of those forces in the further evolution of this wonderful people. Pp. 457. Price $2. Published by the Fleming H. Revell Co., New York and Chicago.

OUR HOME MUSIC CLASS

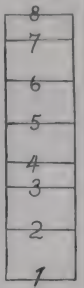
SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON XI.

Intervals.—We have learned that the tones of the scale differ in pitch. We now learn that the difference in pitch between any two tones is called an in al. There are two kinds of intervals in the scale; the larger are called steps, the ller, half steps. The half steps occur between Mi and Fa, and Ti Do.

Illustration.—The term "scale" comes from a Latin word that means ladder; the therefore, may be represented by a picture of a ladder. The rounds represent the and the spaces between the rounds represent the interv als between the tones. No- at the spaces between the third and fourth and seventh and eighth rounds are only s large as those at other points. The smaller spaces represent the half steps, the spaces the whole steps. You should draw the diagram several times, looking at the d copy, then draw it from memory. This practice will fix in your mind the order intervals as they occur in the scale.



Besides the names steps and half steps, intervals are also called sec- , thirds, fourths, and so on. The interval from any tone to the next ale succession is called a second. From any tone to the third tone third; to the fourth tone, a fourth, and so on. Intervals are further ed as to their size and musical effect as major and minor. A sec- that is equal to a whole step is called a major second; a second is equal to a half step is a minor second. A major third is equal o steps; a minor third to a step and a half. A major interval ex- ses brightness, joyousness; a minor interval is sad, plaintive.

For practice, point out on the scale ladder seconds and thirds, major and minor, g them as you pick them out at random. Read the following exercise by interval, s name the interval represented by the two notes in each measure

Ex. 50.

Chromatic Scale.—Between any two tones of the scale that form the interval step there may be introduced an intermediate tone. An intermediate tone is ed and represented in connection with either of the two tones between which it rs. If named from the lower tone, it is called "sharp," and is represented on the ee that represents the lower tone, by the use of a sharp or other modifying sign. amed from the upper tone, it is called "flat," and is represented by the degree represents the upper tone, by the use of a flat or sign of similar meaning. Re- , in the last lesson, what was said about the naming and representation of the k keys of the piano or organ.

The regular members of the scale, the essential tones, are called Diatonic tones; ntermediate tones are called Chromatic tones. The scale composed of diatonic s is called the Diatonic Scale; the scale composed of all the tones is called the omatic Scale.

Ex. 51. Chromatic Scale ascending. Pronounce "i" as "ee" in "see."

do di re ri mi fa fi so si la li ti do
1 ♯1 2 ♯2 3 4 ♯4 5 ♯5 6 ♯6 7 8

Ex. 52. Chromatic Scale descending. Pronounce "e" as "a" in "say." "Ra" is pronounced do ti te la le so se fa mi me re ra do

8 7 ♭7 6 ♭6 5 ♭5 4 3 ♭3 2 ♭2 1

The sharps, flats and similar modifying signs, when used out of the signature e, are called Accidentals. There are seven of these characters, viz., the sharp, natural, double sharp, double flat, natural-sharp, natural-flat. Each of them, nonly, affects a degree of the staff a half step higher or lower. Thus a sharp s a tone a half step higher; a flat, a tone a half step lower. The natural con- cts the effect of a sharp or flat. Following a sharp, it means a half step lower; a flat, it means a half step higher. The double sharp is commonly used on a ee that is already sharped in the signature, and simply means a half step higher. effect is contradicted by the combined character of natural and sharp. The le flat is used on a degree already flatted, and simply means a half step lower. contradicted by the natural and flat combined. The effect of an accidental inues to the end of the measure in which it occurs.

A BOWERY MISSION CONVERT

MR. EDWARD CHAMBERS is one of the Bowery Mission leaders. He is foreman in a large factory in New York City, having many "hands" under him. Four years ago he was a tramp. No one would think it to look at him now, as he stands upon the Mission platform, leading the meeting. Tall, sprightly, intelligent, gentlemanly-looking, a fluent speaker, his whole being throbbing with earnestness, there is no trace visible of his old life of restless "hoboism."

It was one of the largest crowds that ever attended an anniversary meeting that was present on a recent Monday night, when Mr. Chambers celebrated the completion of his fourth year in the Christian life. He is perhaps better known on the Bowery than any of the Mission workers, for he is unfailing in his attention to the Mission services.

When the poor, tired men leave the Mission, after the evening service, Mr. Chambers' hand is generally the last one they grasp, for he always stands at the door, trying to have a last word with them. The men in the lodging-houses know him, because he has been so often seen there, either in the old days, when he himself was one of the lodgers, or since his conversion, when he has been in search of some wanderer. The crowd that filled the building, therefore, on the evening of his anniversary was largely his personal friends. Standing on the piano was one of the most beautiful bouquets that has ever been seen in the Mission. It bore the words, "We wish you a happy anniversary."

MR. EDWARD CHAMBERS

Seldom has there been a more jubilant meeting within the old Mission walls. Mrs. Bird was present, and spoke with great tenderness of her love for "her boy," and of her gratitude to God for raising up such a loyal and devoted worker in the Mission.

Mr. Chambers' address was intensely interesting. His mother had died when he was so young, that he had no remembrance of her whatever. Her place had been filled by an aged grandmother, who tried to give him a Christian training, but early in life he had given way to dissipation, which resulted at last in his becoming a confirmed tramp. Few people have any idea of the deadly fascination such a life has when once it dominates a man. This young man spent several years in ceaseless wandering in all parts of the States. A little over four years ago, he had made a journey on the freight cars from Texas, and, arriving in New York City, spent some weeks sleeping in the parks, and wherever he could find a quiet corner at night.

At last he was attracted to the Bowery Mission, and attended one of Mrs. Bird's Thursday-night meetings. He was so impressed by what he heard, that, getting some notepaper from one of the lodging-houses, he sat down in Battery Park and wrote a long letter to Mrs. Bird, to which she immediately replied, and the result was that on coming to the Mission the next time, he gave himself up to God, with the prayer, "God help me and give me some work to do!" The prayer was quickly answered, and a position as dish-washer in a down-town restaurant was secured for him. After seven months spent in this menial position, he obtained another as an elevator runner, which he held for over two years. He now holds a responsible position in the same building.

At the anniversary meeting, many of the workers testified to the immense value of his services in the Mission work. He never gets discouraged over the failings of men. He always lives and works in hope. When everybody else, even the most patient and forbearing, has given a man up, because of his repeated backslidings, Brother Chambers sticks to him to the last. He never leaves a meeting until almost everybody else has gone, lest there should be some poor, weary-hearted man left in some corner, that needs help and comfort. For the past year, Mr. Chambers has been the Sunday evening leader of the Mission, and, it is on this occasion, that one of the largest crowds of the week assemblies. J. G. HALLIMOND, Sup't.

THE GLORIOUS OUTLOOK*

The Certainty of Ultimate Triumph, the Cheer of Every Christian Worker

FAR away, in uncongenial surroundings, often exposed to hostile attack, separated from native country and beloved friends, the missionary needs encouragement. If he was seeking wealth, or power, or fame, his reward might come in his lifetime; but the work he is doing, will not, as he knows, come to fruition so soon. He labors, and another will enter into his labors, and far on in the distance, some one will see the glorious harvest. It is something to know that, and to a man so unselfish as he who gives himself to missionary labor, it is all that he needs. If he can only be assured that the cause will ultimately triumph, he is content to remain unnoticed and unknown. The joy that filled the heart of the prophet, as he saw in vision, the future glory of his people, is the joy that sustains and encourages the missionary, as he reads the promise, that in the end, the whole world shall bow to his Lord. It is no imperial supremacy of his race that he expects, he is not charmed by the idea of kings bringing their tribute to any worldly capital; but his highest hopes will be fulfilled when every heart is a throne for his Lord, and in all the world Christ's rule shall be acknowledged.

How long that glorious era has been in coming. Generation after generation has lived and struggled, and sinned and suffered and passed away. We must believe that God knows and plans wisely, but to us sometimes, it seems as if it was not worth the doing. Out of all this misery and sorrow there must come some end, that will justify all the sad past. We have the promise, and it now does seem nearer fulfilment than ever before. During the past century the church has bestirred herself as in no century since Apostolic times. The pioneer work has been done in nearly every heathen land, and the prospects of harvest are brighter. True, in professedly Christian lands, there is coldness and scepticism, and formality; but, how soon and how surely could the Holy Spirit bring the dry bones to life. The time is certainly coming, when the whole world shall lay aside its wickedness, its selfishness and its rebellion, and hail the supremacy of the Prince of Peace. There ought to be no depression in any Christian heart. The word of the Lord is sure.

DAVID'S CHARACTER

Great as Poet, Musician, Warrior and King

By Mrs. M. Baxter

DURING the whole reign of Saul, the ark of God remained on one side in the house of Abinadab. God had ordained in the wilderness that the ark should be always in the midst of the people, their recognized centre; and it manifested how far the heart of the people of Israel had departed from their God, even before they rejected him as their King, that they should never have brought back the ark of God into the tabernacle, which was at Shiloh.

But David, the man after God's own heart, was of another spirit, and he brought up the ark to Jerusalem to be in the centre of the people; and then his heart was set upon building the temple. All must give way until God has his place. This is the spirit which God would have to actuate every child of God. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness" (Matt. 6:33).

He carried this burden to the Lord, and graciously the Lord met him; and before he accepted the purpose of David's heart to build him a house, he declared to his servant that he would make him a house (II. Sam. 7:11). As we see from this precious portion of God's Word, David was now at his zenith; beloved of God and beloved of his people; at rest from his enemies, and in possession of promises for himself and his posterity, which were to endure forever. David was overcome with the grace and favor of his God; his heart was full, and he could only say, "And what can David say more unto thee?" But it is in such moments, and not in the time of perplexity and trouble, that we are the most open to temptation. Just because David had reached such a point in communion with his God, just because God's grace was so manifested to him, he must be put to the proof as few others have been.

Some might think it would have been better to stop the history of David at II. Sam. 10, and to leave out the record of his grievous fall, which is such a stumbling-block to those who look for goodness in man himself. But the whole of the Old Testament is a photograph of man as he is; not the ideal of man, but the fact of man as a fallen being. And God, in order to show men the exceeding riches of his grace, which is the only way of saving man from sin, must let the sin which is within come to the surface. Man must know the plague of his own heart (I. Kings 8:38) before he will appreciate the grace which saves and cleanses the utterly unworthy by Christ's poured out life. David said to God, "Who am I, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?" (II. Sam. 7:18). God would answer his question, and show him who and what he really was. God allowed Satan to tempt his servant, and this man of God fell. He need not have fallen. Probably, after his wonderful intercourse with God, there was a reaction, and he was not vigilant. Thus the enemy found an entrance, and the servant of the Lord sinned grievously.

Some would say, "There is no excuse for such a man falling into such a sin." Why? Because he knew God so well. But is there any excuse for you and me falling into any sin? Do not we, too, know God? "But I am not David," you will say; "I have not his gifts and his advantages." Yet David's God is your God, if you are a child of God. Let us not judge either David or anyone else, but only thank God, with a very humble heart, if we have been kept from any sin to which we have been tempted. Only God's grace has kept us. The broken confessions, the absence of any excuse, the light from God upon the utter corruption of his own nature, show us the real brokenness of David's heart. His real abhorrence of sin: how utterly he takes the blame upon himself and justifies God, reveals to us the state of a heart really possessed by God.

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY*

The Duty of Aiding in the Propagation of the Gospel, Either by Personal Effort or by Gifts

WHEN Christ gave his final injunctions to his followers before his ascension, he did not separate one class from another, but left the work to be done by whosoever of them would take it up. The glad news was to be disseminated—that was his wish—and we must assume that he expected all to have a share in it. There must have been some to whom preaching would be impossible, but that fact did not relieve them from responsibility in the matter. There were other ways, as there still are, in which they can share in it. All cannot be missionaries now, but every one can help in the great task by making missionary work possible. The missionary societies are obliged to economize, either by reducing salaries, or by refraining from sending out new missionaries. What better service can any one render than by helping to relieve them of the necessity? To raise funds, so that new fields may be occupied, or existing fields better manned, is as truly missionary work as the missionary himself might do. It is to take a share in the service, and if it is less heroic and less direct, it is the more unselfish. As to the need for that kind of work there is no doubt.

Besides this work, there is a service that is sorely needed. It is a shame to us that, when the observant native of India, China or Japan comes here, he is astonished to find how little the Christians that he meets, resemble the missionaries whom he knew in his own country. How many members of churches does he meet, whose connection with Christianity is altogether comprised in attending church once on the Lord's Day? They are not teaching in the Sunday School, nor doing anything to extend Christ's Kingdom. It must astonish him to learn, that while missionaries have been sent to his own people, ten thousand miles away, there are in our great cities multitudes entirely ignorant of the Gospel. The inference he naturally draws from the fact, is that religion is not so important a part of our lives as his study of the missionary's life had led him to suppose. This is a question of responsibility for every Christian. Those who stay at home may render essential service, either by helping to support the missionary, or by spreading the Gospel at home.

THE CHRISTMAS COVER.

LESLIE'S MONTHLY

10 cts. a Copy; $1.00 a Year.

ENLARGED. IMPROVED. BEAUTIFIED.

We believe in Leslie's Monthly. It is growing bigger in bulk, broader in policy, timelier in matter, more human in treatment. Leslie's Monthly for 1904 is the best magazine we have ever planned.

A FREE GIFT to Subscribers: Leslie's Heroine Calendar and the superb Christmas Number. Use the coupon below at once.

THE IMPORTED AMERICAN.

You will marvel at the enterprise of LESLIE'S MONTHLY. To study the human side of the great problem of American immigration, LESLIE'S MONTHLY has sent its well-known correspondents, Mr. and Mrs. Broughton Brandenburg, to live in Sicily, with a poor Italian family, to accompany them in the steerage to this country, and learn from closest intimacy their hopes and fears, and afterwards the realization of their settlement in the promised land. This series of articles makes a wonderful story, and casts a white light on the process which manufactures American citizens out of such raw material. It is a work worth doing.

A WOMAN'S BREAD AND BUTTER.

You will be interested in the human quality of LESLIE'S MONTHLY. It is to LESLIE'S MONTHLY that Maud Ballington Booth contributes the wonderful story of her work in prison. LESLIE'S, too, will print serially the true and inspiring account of a girl's struggle for life in a great city. From the "learner's wage" of $1.50 a week she climbs painfully up to a position of comfort. It is a real story.

THE GREAT AMERICAN LOBBY.

You will grow enthusiastic at the patriotism of LESLIE'S MONTHLY. It is LESLIE'S which is investigating with scrupulous care our vicious system of government by the Lobby, and which prints exactly what it finds. It is LESLIE'S, too, which is publishing true, unvarnished accounts of the Bosses who govern us, and who never give us a chance to vote them down.

GOOD TO READ.

You will delight in the entertainment of LESLIE'S MONTHLY. The delightful "Domesticities," by the author of "Wee MacGreegor," "A Few Real Boys," by the author of "The Real Diary of a Real Boy," "A Honeymoon on a Houseboat," by the man who spent it. These are but three of a score of features solely to entertain.

All Sorts of GOOD Stories.

You will enjoy LESLIE'S stories. We believe in LESLIE'S writers. How can we help it? See their names:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

J. R., Plainfield, N. J. What is the derivation or meaning of the word "Panama"?

The National Geographic Magazine, Washington, D.C., gives this explanation: "It is supposed by some that Panama derived its name from the native word for butterfly. Explorers of the interior tell of swarms of butterflies which at times rise on the slopes of the mountains in dense clouds, darkening the sunshine. Others maintain that the name is from an Indian word meaning 'abounding in fish.'"

Subscriber, Troy, N. Y. 1. What constitutes a Sunday School? Can a number of Christian women, gathering the children together on Sunday in a private house, or schoolhouse, forming them into classes, and with prayer, singing, and teaching them the Word of God, yet without any formal organization, be properly called a Sunday School, or must there be a regular organization with a superintendent and all the officers, to constitute a Sunday School? 2. When Robert Raikes gathered the children together on Sunday, and hired teachers to teach them, could that properly be called a Sunday School?

1. Yes, that would be a Sunday School, and it might be a very good one, too. There are hundreds of the kind in different parts of the country, which are wholly undenominational. There must, of course, be some sort of organization, such as the forming of classes, choice of teachers, selection of topics, and, to some extent, the order of study, rotation of exercises, etc. It is, however, advisable to have all the available aids in Sunday School work. Write to American Sunday School Union, Philadelphia, Pa. 2. Yes, though of course it was very different from the Sunday Schools of our own day.

Many thanks for the beautiful Calendar I received to-day. It is like all of your premiums—so much prettier than we expect. With best wishes for you and the best of papers.
HATTIE COATH.
Baltimore, Md.

B. S., East Orange, N. J. Is not the word "parabola" used mostly in geometry, and is it ever used in philosophy?

It is a geometrical expression. The word "parabole," a rhetorical expression—meaning a comparison, a simile, a parable—may have been confounded with parabola.

Scott Clark, Cambridge, Ill What do you call vainglory?

Vainglory is idle boasting, vanity in one's own achievements, pride, station, pomp, self-gratulation. The word is from the Latin vana, empty; gloria, glory, and it is used in contrast with the right kind of spirit, which attributes to God all the glory for high achievements, benefits and blessings.

Gentlemen: I want to thank you for the beautiful copy of Pilgrim's Progress, which was received by me a few days ago. It is splendidly gotten up and might well grace any library. All the gifts from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are certainly well worth having, they are always of the best. I shall take pleasure in showing it to my friends.

Thanks, Mr. Editor, seem very tame,
For the Calendar, which speedily came.
Work so artistic; I gaze and I gaze
On butterflies. I am lost in amaze.
By thousands, and thousands, are now en route.
In many States they are now flying about.
In far away lands, more will soon soar away.
Homes ever ready for them all to stay.
In all places where the butterflies rest,
May you ever be as welcome a guest.
Mechanicsville, N. Y. LAURA M. G.

Reader, Elco, Ill. Is it right for a young man, who is trying to live a Christian life, to work on the railroad or at anything else where he will be compelled to work on Sunday? Is it possible for him to remain a Christian and do such work?

Yes, we believe he can do so and still be a Christian, although he will be sorely tried. We have repeatedly stated that the only way out for one who finds that his regular calling encroaches on his Sunday rest and religious privileges, is to make a change as speedily as possible. We do not urge any one to give up a situation and face idleness; but if his conscience tells him he is doing wrong in continuing as at present, then a change is the only resource.

Dear Christian Herald:—Many thanks for the beautiful Pilgrim's Progress, which arrived safely. The Calendar, too, is beautiful. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in one sense a miraculous paper. I am sure it must receive divine help and direction.

A reader, Cedar Rapids, Ia., writes:

I am glad to see you are agitating the subject of reform in church music. It needs it badly. I have known of some of the sweetest devotional hymns, written by request of these song-book makers, returned because they were not available for "ragtime music." There is one tune in use in our Sunday Schools and prayer-meetings which I never hear without a shudder. It is set to the words, "There is a fountain filled with blood." And the refrain is, "Filled with blood," "Filled with blood." Our children have little enough reverence for sacred things; we need not give them occasion for less. And what kind of religion a man has—if he has any at all—that could put so sacred and solemn a theme to a jig tune I cannot imagine.

A SKI AND TOBOGGAN PARTY AT STOCKHOLM.

One of the most interesting sports in Norway, and which has grown popular in Canada and some parts of our own land, among both old and young, is ski running or tobogganing. The ski is the toboggan in Canada. Journeys of many miles are taken on it. Strange to say, it can be used more easily on soft snow than where there is a hard crust, and for this reason people can make journeys far out into the country upon skis. Experts sometimes attain a speed of six or seven miles an hour without difficulty. Jumping and running contests are among the most popular sports at holiday time, both in Norway and Sweden. Courses are arranged on hillsides accessible to some of the large cities, and prizes are given to those who can make the longest jump. Some of these leaps are really wonderful, the jumper covering a distance of over a hundred feet, throwing himself from the brink of elevations from thirty to forty feet in height, and landing on the snow beneath. If he is an expert, there is no real danger in this feat; skilful ones seldom fall except on their feet. One of the best skeeing courses in the world has been arranged near Stockholm.

We are constantly receiving letters in a tone similar to the foregoing. The reform movement is gaining ground.

John Van H., Grand Haven, Mich. What does character mean in the English language? Does it mean simply reputation, or does it mean more than that?

Reputation is what a man is reputed to be—what the world believes him to be. Character is what he really is, irrespective of the world's judgment. A man may have a very good reputation, yet be a very poor character in reality.

Mrs. N. L. G., Miskimon, Va. In what month of the year were Edgar A. Poe, Sir Walter Raleigh and Mary Queen of Scots born?

Rev. E. O. Guerrant, of the Soul Winners' Society, writes us from Wilmore, Ky.:

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Your favor, enclosing $132.10 for our mountain missions, from your generous readers, came during my absence from home, and I hasten to thank you and them for your timely help. God will reward you, as he only can. I am glad to say he continues graciously to bless our missions and multiply their number and efficiency. We have had over eighty missionaries in the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina and Virginia this year, and they have labored most faithfully and successfully. I know of no missions anywhere that have accomplished such large results with the same means at their disposal.

Mother, Alameda, Calif. I observed a reference in a local paper here to the fact that the Czar of Russia, like Emperor William, was somewhat of a poet. Can THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which somehow seems to be able to find out everything, tell me where I can find any poem from the imperial Czarish pen?

One of the London publications quite lately printed several verses over the signature "Olof," with the statement that they were really written by the Czar. Translated, the second and third stanzas are as follows:

"My happiness was born at night and succored in the gloom,
My pleasures have dissolved in flight, heart-stricken at my doom.
My soul strives blindly for relief, chilled as by drifting snow,
By doubts which scoff at the belief of finding peace below."

The poem, as a whole, is said to be expressed in high poetical language, which is much finer in the original than when translated.

The Boy in the Manger

HERE is a touching little story from real life—a story which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has investigated, and knows to be true, and one which it specially commends to those who may entertain a doubt that such things actually happen nowadays:

A Brooklyn policeman, a few days ago, found a little boy asleep in a manger, in a stable on Vermont avenue, in that city. The kind-hearted stableman had allowed him to sleep there for several nights. He was cold and hungry, and the officer took him to the Children's Court, in Brooklyn, where he was held until his case could be investigated. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children cared for him. The child's story as told by himself, would bring tears to any eyes. He is a refined, delicate-looking lad of twelve.

"Mother is dead," he said, "and father was very sick and had to go to the hospital. When he came out he could not get work, and our home was taken from us. Then father went away. He was always good to me; but he was sick and poor, and nobody came to give us anything. After that I was fond of going to a stable near us, and the stableman, Louis, did not put me out. Dewey, the horse, had his stall there, and soon we were friends. I was asleep in the manger, when the policeman came and took me away. Dewey, the horse, did not want me to leave him, and he fought for me. I always shared my breakfast with Dewey, which was two rolls that the stableman gave me. I cried when I had to leave Dewey. I loved him, and he was fond of me. I wish I could see Dewey, now."

Then the tear-drops rolled down the child's face, and he wiped them away with the sleeve of his poor, torn shirt.

"Do you know that God, your Father above, is watching over you," he was asked, "and will take care of you if you are a good boy?"

"Yes, but I want to find my father! He was kind to me, and took care good until he got sick. I wish he would come back again."

The pathetic, appealing little face, pale and emaciated from lack of nourishing food, told his story of struggle with poverty and sickness, and made one pray that the Christ-child might find room in many hearts this Christmastide, and that hands might be stretched out everywhere to relieve distress and lift up the desolate and homeless. The saddest life may be filled with sunshine, if we make the Christmastide a season of help to those less fortunate than ourselves. It is not always dissipation and sin that bring people to these great extremities, but misfortune, illness and lack of courage.

Christ came to save the wanderers and to protect the little boy asleep in a manger.

"Christ was born in Bethlehem
And in a manger laid."

Where his head has lain, a poor, wandering boy may find rest. Sweet Charity goes out to find the lone, neglected, homeless children. What a beautiful face she has! What a soft voice! How kind! Yes, Charity, you are always welcome.

A merry Christmas to you
And a happy New Year!—M. B. C.

STEP BY STEP, THEY LEARN THE STORY OF THEIR NEW COUNTRY'S FOUNDATION AND CONSTITUTION

A PIONEER SCHOOL FOR IMMIGRANTS

It is Crowded by Old and Young of Many Different Nationalities, Studying our Language and Constitution

LEAVING to others the verbal war over the advantages or disadvantages of permitting Europe's surplus population to descend on our shores, a little band of earnest patriots has established the first of a number of schools soon to be opened, where immigrants may learn to become good Americans through a series of blackboard lessons. There would seem to be no more earnest seeker after this kind of knowledge than the immigrant, for the school, opened at 218 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia, has already scores more pupils than can be accommodated.

The immigrants, chiefly Russians, with their sons and daughters, come to the school hungering for knowledge. Hundreds have been enrolled, and the rooms are nightly crowded. The teachers—volunteers from the city's educational staff, assisted by a few earnest workers who wish to see the ignorant immigrant lifted to a higher plane—give their services free. All are accomplished linguists, for it was found necessary to permit only those to undertake the work of teaching who could speak several languages. Several tongues are spoken by the men, women, boys and girls who attend the school, few of them have been in the country longer than six months, and scarcely any know more than enough English to make themselves understood in that language.

As for reading or writing the language of their adopted country, that was not for a moment to be expected. It was therefore necessary to begin the work of teaching these aliens the Constitution of their new country by making them familiar with the alphabet; then progressing to simple words of one syllable, and so on to the higher heights of learning, where it would be made possible for them to understand the meaning of the written law of the land.

This pioneer school has been divided into three classes. In one room, about a hundred grown-up men and women, with a sprinkling of boys and girls, can be found each night wrestling with the mysteries of orthography. It is strange to see these elderly scholars knitting their brows over such problems as the spelling of the word "girl," the correct pronunciation of "d-o-g," or the proper sound to give to the first letter of the personal pronoun "we." In the second room, the scholars who can spell correctly simple words of one syllable, are gathered for easy reading lessons. Grown men, with the untidy beard of the typical immigrant, sit side by side with bright-eyed boys and girls, all so ignorant that almost any American child could teach them, but all in deadly earnest and determined to learn. In the third room are the advanced scholars, to whom it is found possible to teach the Constitution of the United States, a word at a time. Among the immigrants who have been attracted to the school are some who had more educational advantages in the Old Country than the majority.

Some, it was found, when the eager pupils were classified at the opening of the school, could read and write English a little. These are in a class by themselves. With the clauses of the Constitution written on the blackboard, these advanced scholars are able to commit it to memory, a line at a time, the teacher carefully and patiently explaining the full meaning of each word, until they know the history and meaning of this framework of national liberty.

The teachers are enthusiastic over their work. It is almost a new experience to those who have taught in American public schools to find such whole-hearted reaching after knowledge as these immigrant scholars display. There is no frivolity. The middle-aged man who pores over his first reader, is as anxious to solve the mystery of the printed pages as any learned scholar delving into the hidden secrets of musty manuscripts, for light on the problems of history. It may seem comical to the well-educated onlooker, to listen to a youthful teacher leading an elderly woman—who probably has sons older than he—through the mazy labyrinths of the alphabet. But the scholars fail to see any humorous side to it. They are there to learn how to speak, and read, and write English, to the end that they may be fitted to master the language of the land of their adoption.

When the teachers have taken a sufficient number of scholars through the school course, it is intended to open other schools, placing some of the graduates from the central school to teach their countrymen what they have learned.

In this systematic way the work will be spread, and in time, when similar schools have been established in other cities, as is intended, the plague of ignorance will be removed from the immigrant, and it will be no longer necessary to wait for the second generation before a family from the Old World will become true Americans.

THE MAGI AND THE CHRIST

Sermon Preached in Calvary Baptist Church, New York, Sunday Morning, December 20th, by the Pastor

REV. ROBERT STUART MAC ARTHUR, D.D.

TEXT:—"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea, in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem," etc.—Matt. 2: 1, 2.

THE sublimest and divinest joy ever known on earth was born at Bethlehem. Christ in the heart, means a song in the mouth. Christ born in the world makes the world melodious with music. A songless world is a sunless world. Christianity has made all the harps of heaven and earth tuneful with joy. The very air was tremulous with song when Christ was born. Thus it comes to pass that we have the Magnificat of Mary, the Benedictus of Zechariah, the Gloria in Excelsis of the angels, and the Nunc Dimittis of Simeon. Angelic choirs chanted the only song of heaven ever heard by human ears, and a star marked a new pathway in the heavens to honor the birth of the "holy child, Jesus." Let us, with the wise men from the East, bend over the manger-cradle of the infant Redeemer and learn the lessons suggested by the text of the morning.

The inquiry of the Magi instantly attracts our attention, excites our curiosity, and evokes our approval. The example of the Magi is worthy of commendation and imitation. There is no "ism" in relation to Jesus Christ so dangerous as indifferentism. Herod asked no questions regarding the birth of Jesus until he was troubled by the questions of the Magi. The priests and the scribes seemed to have been ignorant of the wondrous birth until Herod called them together demanding information. The people in the streets of Jerusalem passed to and fro in utter ignorance of the birth of the true King of the Jews, of the advent of a new era in the history of humanity, and of a new epiphany of the God of heaven and earth. Neither the birth nor the death, the cradle nor the cross of Jesus is an object of the slightest interest to tens of thousands today. As there was no room for Christ in the inn, so there is no room for Christ today because political ambitions, business ventures, and social aspirations fill the hearts of tens of thousands all over the land. There is hope for men when they begin to ask after Christ. The Magi, in their seeking for Jesus, set us a worthy example.

"BEHOLD, THERE CAME WISE MEN FROM THE EAST TO JERUSALEM"

They certainly knew the fact of our Lord's wondrous birth. This is the greatest fact in human history, or in divine revelation. It is the fulfilment of prophecy and the realization of the wistful hopes of humanity. The incarnation of the Son of God is the centre of the history of the race. All great events which preceded the incarnation converged toward it. All great events which succeed it, diverge from it. It is the pivotal point around which, in smaller or larger circles, all events revolve. Even though there were no future life, the incarnation would be an event of supreme importance. It is the great and joyous feast of the church in family life; it is the grand jubilee of children in the homes of Christendom; and it is prophetic of the true golden age of blessing, peace and joy, for the entire race. It has given a new glory to life, a new trend to eternity, and a new radiancy to heaven.

The Magi had approximately accurate knowledge of the time of our Lord's birth. The exact date of that birth we do not know, and never shall know. Neither the day, nor the year can be ascertained with certainty. Fabricius gives a catalogue of one hundred and thirty different opinions concerning the year of Christ's birth; and the day of his birth has been placed by various sects and scholars in every month of the year. The twentieth of May, the twentieth of April, the sixth of January, have been favorite dates with some sections of the church. Dionysius the Little, in the year 526 A.D., placed the birth of Christ in the 754th year of Rome; but it has long been admitted that this was an error of at least four years. We know positively that Jesus was born before the death of Herod the Great; and we know by an eclipse of the moon, which occurred a little before his death, that he died in the 750th year of Rome. Instead of dating this year 1903, we ought, therefore, to make it 1907.

If God had designed that Christ's birthday should be a time of religious observance, he certainly would have revealed the exact date. We are to know Christ spiritually rather than after the flesh. There is not the slightest doubt but that December 25 was chosen, because at that time great heathen festivals were observed in Rome; and the early Christians desired to make the birth-festival of Christ a substitute for, or a transformation of these heathen festivals. Many early Christians also saw that the birth of Christ, the Sun of Righteousness and the Light of the world, placed on December 25, symbolized the birth-festival of the natural sun, which on that date lengthens the days, decreases the darkness, and begins anew his heroic career. Not until the fourth century was this date observed with any degree of uniformity as the date of our Lord's birth. Let us gladly accept the fact of that birth without undue inquiry concerning the exact date.

The Magi had some knowledge also of the place of our Lord's birth. Our text distinctly locates this Bethlehem as being in Judea, because there was another Bethlehem in the tribe of Zebulun, near the sea of Galilee. It is most beautiful that in Bethlehem, meaning "house of bread," the Christ, who is the Bread of heaven, should be born. The name Bethlehem is now a household word around the globe. Prophecy pointed to Bethlehem as the place of the wondrous birth. Marvelous are the providences by which God fulfilled those ancient prophecies. We might have expected that the birth would take place in Nazareth, but ancient prophecy must be fulfilled, and God will use the wisdom and ambition of men to accomplish his Divine purposes. Yonder sits the mighty Augustus on the throne of the world, and Judea was a dependency of his vast empire. His empire reached from the Euphrates to the Atlantic. Over this great domain he was sole ruler. Partly for purposes of taxation, partly for more general statistics, and partly to know the warlike resources of the land, Augustus ordered a general census. Doubtless he wished to reduce Judea to the state of a Roman province, but he permits King Herod to take the census according to the Jewish usage by a division of tribes. Both Joseph and Mary, although their fortunes were now fallen, belonged to the tribe of Judah and the family of David. Bethlehem was the seat of that family and the native place of the royal David; to Bethlehem, therefore, they must go.

Think of the long journey from Nazareth, and especially in the trying circumstances in which Joseph and Mary were placed! Think of them as they passed town after town made famous in Israel's history. See them as they approach the town of Bethlehem.

Immortal Bethlehem! Great is thy glory and undying thy fame among the towns of the world! Here, a thousand years before, David was born; here the events connected with Ruth, Naomi and Boaz occurred, and near here the beloved wife of Jacob departed this life. Around no town in the world's history is there such a cluster of suggestive names of women as around Bethlehem—Rachael, Naomi, Ruth, Mary. The heart of the traveler beats with unusual emotion to this day as he passes the Well of the Magi, and the Tomb of Rachael, and then gets his first glimpses of immortal Bethlehem. Yonder is the town standing on the summit of a narrow ridge, while beneath the village are the terraced slopes clothed with olives, vines and fig trees, and sweeping in graceful curves around the ridge. The journey of the reverent Magi becomes marvelously real to the traveler who goes even to-day from Jerusalem to Bethlehem.

Who were the Magi? To this question many answers have been given. It seems possible in our day to answer it with authority. It is true that the East whence they came, may mean either Arabia, Persia, Chaldæa or Parthia, with the adjacent provinces. When we have in mind the prophecy in Numbers 24: 17, concerning "a Star out of Jacob," we can see how the expectation of some great king arising in Judea might be found among Eastern astrologers. We know also from Suetonius and Tacitus that such an opinion prevailed extensively at that time; we know also from the prophecy of the seventy weeks in Daniel, that a remarkable celestial appearance was expected at this time. Without doubt the Magi were a priestly tribe or caste among the Medes, and afterwards the Medo-Persians. They were the recognized teachers of religion and science. These Magi were men of vast influence and power. They were students of astrology, medicine, divination, and incantation. In those early days they maintained a high position and possessed an elevated character. Simon Magus represents the utmost degeneracy of the ancient and noble Magi, just as our words magic and magician stand for the degradation of this ancient and noble art. It is almost certain that the Magi went from Persia or Babylonia to pay their homage to the infant Messiah. The tradition that they were kings grew out of the prophecy in Psalms 72: 10, "The kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts," and Isaiah 60: 6 "they shall bring gold and incense." Longfellow and others have written poems on these supposed three kings, and the tradition of the three kings is one of the most general and popular fancies of the Old World; but there is absolutely no authority for affirming that the Magi were kings; indeed, it is almost certain that they were not. Neither are the traditional names, Caspar, Melchior and Balthazar, of any authority or importance, except as connected with modern poetry and art. We do not know that there were but three of these men; the number three is apparently suggested by the number of gifts which they offered.

These Magi say that they had seen "his star in the East." What are we to understand by "his star?" Have we here a miracle in the narrative? Are they right who say that we have only a natural appearance used by God to guide the Magi to the place of Christ's birth? Non-supernatural explanations of this star have been offered. The first was suggested by the astronomer Kepler, in 1630. He shows that in the year 747 of Rome, there were three conjunctions of the planets Jupiter and Saturn in May, October and November. It is said that if the Magi started after the May conjunction, they would see in Jerusalem the October or November conjunction. This is an interesting line of inquiry. It may have in it elements of truth. It is, of course, simpler to introduce miraculous agency and believe in a star specially created to perform this service; but we ought still to remember that God can use a natural conjunction of stars for a special purpose in his providence. There is this difficulty in believing that the conjunction of stars was "his star," because the

One Brave American Girl's Work in China

NINETEEN years ago, Miss Mary Fulton, equipped with a fine medical and surgical education, filled with a spirit of self-sacrifice and a consuming desire to help humanity, left her home in Indianapolis for Canton, China. To-day, as a result of her energy, she is at the head of the David Gregg Hospital, the Pierson Dispensary, the Woman's Medical College, and the Nurses' Training School, all in one compound in that heathen city.

The raising of the funds and the erection of the buildings are due to her efforts. She planned and equipped them, and now she personally supervises the entire work of each. Not only this, but, after mastering the language herself, she translated into Chinese all the books used in the medical college, and we know that textbooks of this character demand absolute accuracy.

This medical college is the first established for Chinese women. The building was the gift of one man, at Winona Lake, Ind., who, in the summer of 1900, sent Dr. Fulton $4,000 in gold (which brought $8,000 in Chinese money), instructing her to withhold his name from the public. The house was formally opened in December, 1902, by the United States Consul, and so great was the interest of the people that native officials, from the Viceroy down, attended, and a special guard of five hundred soldiers was sent by the government to grace the occasion.

The work of instruction had already begun, and thirteen young women have since been graduated and are now practicing physicians. They are held in great esteem by their countrymen, who feel that a woman conforms to the highest ideas of Chinese propriety in becoming a doctor or nurse. Besides, the cures wrought in the hospital seem miraculous to the superstitious, and command intense admiration from all classes. Hence Dr. Fulton is constantly besieged with applications from families of the highest caste, and, having practically her choice, she selects girls of the finest intellect and physique for her students. As physicians, she declares they cannot be excelled, and they have the long patience and quiet dignity too often lacking in our professional women.

The hospital was dedicated in April, 1902, and has been overfull ever since. All of these buildings are strictly modern and American throughout. Everything in and about them is considered beautiful by the Chinese, so beautiful, that patients plead to be allowed to spend the rest of their lives there. It is a haven of health to them in body and soul.

Both the hospital and the Medical College are entirely self-supporting, although many free beds are maintained by Dr. Fulton's loving friends in this country, and the convalescing ward of the woman's department is supported by a band of young ladies in the Tabernacle Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, called the "Mary Fulton Society." For fifteen years this society has never failed to send the money pledged for the work. The patchwork quilts upon the hospital cots are made of Indianapolis scraps. In return, the society is constantly receiving letters and curios from Canton that keep the members in close touch with the cause they love. Among their treasures are several idols that have been worshiped by many generations, but are now discarded for the God of the Bible, possessed millions held in perpetual terror in China, and many another book interesting and pathetic. These good women do their missionary work in earnest, and the contributions for the present maintenance and the general development of the Singling School.

Large as is Dr. Fulton's field, the hardest and most trying personal work is not all, nor even the largest part. Souls are touched as well as bodies. In this connection point are the Thursday Gospel Church and the Sabbath for Chinese girls, both of which are the special care of her brother, Rev. A. A. Fulton.

THE FIRST HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN IN CHINA

Last May, Dr. Mary Fulton came to America for her second vacation, having had but one year's rest previously during her nineteen years.

Surely we have some Americans who are "ministering angels," whether at home or abroad, and to them much of the progress of Christianity in heathendom is due.

The Magi and the Christ

Greek word is aster, star, and not astron, which would be the natural Greek word for a group of stars; but this difficulty ought not to be pressed unduly.

But be the facts as they may, regarding the nature of the star, it is profoundly interesting that God used the astrological knowledge of these men to guide them to the cradle of the world's Redeemer. God takes men on the basis whereon they stand, and sanctifies their scientific knowledge to guide them to higher truth. The studies of the Magi stimulated their inherent craving for eternal life. The study of astronomy in the case of men naturally devout, is stimulative of religion. In the beautiful nights and cloudless skies of Persia, men found

Suggestions of Infinity and Worship

The science of these men was but another name for religion. Their study of the stars led them to Him who is the Sun of Righteousness. All true science kneels before Christ. Christ is King to-day in the whole realm of truth; and truth, in philosophy and science, reverently worships at his feet. Perhaps science never was so humble, docile, and reverent as it is to-day. The agnostic science of a generation ago has largely given place to a science which loyally and lovingly owns Christ as King in Truth's boundless realm. Both scientists and religionists have been narrow, jealous and bigoted; but the time is coming when, hand-in-hand, they shall joyously march to the music of Christ's name, and then humbly bow in lowliest reverence at his pierced feet. O men of the West learn from the wise men of the East! The day may come when these Magi will rise up in judgment against us at the throne of God.

They came to Jerusalem to find the King of the Jews that they might render him homage. Naturally they went to the capital of the nation to receive intelligence regarding the new-born king. We can well imagine their solicitude as they passed through the gates of the ancient city. To the guards whom they first meet, they present their inquiry, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" With a look of mingled pity and contempt, these guards make reply, "We know no king but Herod." Meeting next members of the Sanhedrin, they repeat their inquiry, and receive but an evasive reply. They next ask a trader, and he replies, "What know or care I regarding a king? If you want to buy or to sell, I am your man." They still press their inquiry, and Herod finally calls the chief priests and scribes, and the answer is secured regarding the place of the King's birth, "In Bethlehem of Judea."

Now the Magi hasten to the town of Bethlehem. For a time the star, which had so long guided their steps, disappeared. Tradition tells us that the Magi, being in doubt as to the direction which they should take, and being weary with their journey, stopped to draw water from the well, since called, "The well of the Magi," and, to their surprise and joy, they saw the star reflected in the water. With fresh courage and complete assurance, they now followed the star "until it stood over where the young child was." To-day it is not surprising that pilgrims kneel in reverence beside the silver star set in the pavement, indicating, according to popular belief, the exact place of our Lord's birth. Around the star is this inscription, "Hic de Virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est." Above this star sixteen silver lamps continually burn. Of these, six belong to the Greek Church, five to the Latin, and five to the Armenian. Here, or near this spot, the Magi "saw the young child with Mary his mother." It is not a little remarkable that in this entire narrative, as seen in verses 13, 14, 20 and 21, a subordinate place is always given to the mother of Jesus. The holy child is mentioned first, and the honored mother last. It is always the child with Mary, in the inspired narrative, and never the Madonna and her child, or "the blessed Virgin with her child," as the Roman Church idolatrously represents the relation between the child and the mother.

The Manger Throne

The Magi showed their faith, not only by starting on their journey, but by their diligent inquiry in Jerusalem, and by their hastening from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. They are now abundantly rewarded for their faith and toil. They see the "holy child Jesus"; they gaze on the King of Glory in his earthly humiliation. The manger-cradle is mightier than the throne of the Cæsars. Little knew, and less cared, the mighty Augustus about the birth in Bethlehem; but the throne of the Cæsars has perished, and the empire of Jesus, the empire of Divine love, rules the world to-day, and with constantly increasing power. The child of Bethlehem is the King of the universe to-day. He is pulling down the strongholds of sin and Satan, and he is irresistibly marching to universal, beneficent and glorious conquest among the nations.

Immediately on seeing the Divine child, the Magi fell down and worshiped him. Perhaps the only reverence they expected to pay him was homage as the King of the Jews; perhaps the word translated worship, ordinarily means nothing more than appropriate respect paid to a superior. But one cannot help feeling that the Magi had new conceptions of this Child-King when they saw him in Bethlehem. We cannot but believe that God, who guided them to his feet gave them insight into his spiritual character and Divine power. We are warranted in believing that they gave him religious homage, genuine adoration. We, surely, are unpardonably guilty if we do not fall at his feet and pay him divine honors. There are those who are willing to honor Christ as the noblest of men, but they refuse him worship as God. They affirm that he was good, but not God. We are warranted in saying that if he were not God, he was not good. He claimed to be divine, and received worship as God. O men and women, fall down before him and give him divine homage! If we fail thus to honor him, the pious men from the East will rise up in the judgment to condemn us.

Significant Offerings

The Magi next poured out their treasures at the feet of the Child-King. It was then, and is now, the custom in the Orient, that one must never come to a superior, especially a king, without some gift. Nothing could be more appropriate than the costly spices and the gold which they poured out as expressions of their homage. It has been suggested that these valuable gifts probably gave to Joseph and Mary the means of support on their journey to Egypt. Perhaps it is too fanciful to give a symbolic interpretation to the threefold gift, making the myrrh indicate the prophet, the incense the high priest, and the gold the splendor of the king. But whether or not we see all this in these gifts, the fact remains that this holy child was the world's Prophet, Priest and King.

Great lessons are suggested as we stand with the Magi beside the cradle of our Lord. We learn the lesson of the glory of motherhood, the sacredness of childhood, the dominancy of pure purpose, self-sacrificing love, and also the right use of the wealth of position and wealth. We are to pour the treasures of wealth now on the altar of service for Jesus Christ. Our gold is never so sanctified as when consecrated to our Divine Lord. Learning from its noblest service when giving homage at his feet. The human spirit of our own day are worshipers of Jesus the Christ. As one after another, successively and serially, we approach with adoring homage at each journey in our life of Christ, saying with Thomas "My Lord and my God." Let us with the Magi seek in the little we have, seeking Christ, as we wish they ask for Father Light, and as we find Christ thus granted, so shall more would find Christ as we seek. Finding him we shall know even as we are known, and have ever-increasing fellowship of heaven's unspeakable joy, where we shall see Christ face to face, and be forever with and like him.

Macedonian Relief Work Now Begun

More Money Sent to Dr. Clark on the Bulgarian Border, and Mr. Bond at Monastir—Sad Pictures of Sufferin

MACEDONIAN REFUGEES FROM GODLEVO RESTING IN THE MEADOWS NEAR DUBINTZA

RELIEF work among the Macedonian refugees on the Bulgarian border, and among the homeless and helpless thousands at Monastir, has already begun. Kind hearts in our own and other lands are helping the little band of missionaries and native pastors in their heroic effort to save the lives of the refugees. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers, foremost in every good work, are represented in the Christ-like benevolence, and their contributions are enabling the workers at Samokov, Monastir and elsewhere, to save precious lives and avert much human suffering. Two more remittances were sent last week from our relief fund: $1,000 to the Rev. Lewis Bond, at Monastir, and $150 to Dr. F. J. Clark, at Samokov, to be applied in aid of the sufferers.

Letters from the field, which we print below, afford a graphic picture of the situation. The first one is from Dr. J. F. Clark, of Samokov, to whom our first remittance was cabled some time ago. He writes:

"Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Your kind letter of October 31, came duly to hand. Thanks. The check you enclosed is now giving warmth and comfort to many to whom bed-covering, straw beds and shoes have already been sent. The larger part of those from Bulgaria who are aiding the insurgents, are refugees.

"Words to describe the conditions in Macedonia are hardly possible, and the facts scarcely to be believed; but I have them from reports weekly received from missionaries and consuls, who were in the best of circumstances to secure facts in Macedonia. I now write these lines while on a two days' journey among those in the region of the Black Sea and Adrianople, who have fled from their burning homes and from the sword.

"Some weeks ago, the definite data from Monastir were: 110 villages destroyed, 50,000 people refugees, a large part of them in the mountains, exposed to the weather day and night. What this means few can imagine. A muleteer saw a dead child with grass in its mouth—its last attempt to prolong life. Many must have had only roots and leaves to eat, and it seems certain that thousands have died of hunger and exposure. In other parts of Macedonia there must be thousands more in like circumstances. In the region of the Black Sea, northeast of Adrianople, the same devastation has taken place. Some 3,000, foreseeing the storm, secretly brought over into Bulgaria their cattle, and all their goods. But near 12,000 (some who ought to know have put it more than double this number), have fled for their lives, with naught for covering day or night except the clothes they wore when the onslaught came. In the past few days, I have seen many of these suffering ones gathered together in shelters of wicker-work, partly plastered with mud; roofs thatched with straw, but with many openings under the eaves and elsewhere, for the winter cold to enter, and with only the damp ground for a bed. Their clothing is hardly enough for warm weather. What will it do for them when the bleak winds from the Black Sea shall beat upon them during the coming months.

	Refugees
Reckoning for region of Monastir..	50,000
For other parts of Macedonia.....	10,000
For the district near the Black Sea	20,000
For those who have come into Samokov and vicinity.....	5,000
It gives a total of sufferers ..	85,000

"If only a half of these still need aid, 42,500 are in need of all things—for food, clothing and shelter, aside from what may be needed in the spring to secure harvests for another year.

"In four places south of Bourgas, where I have been with the delegate from the Central Relief Committee, I have seen and heard his statistics verified. Taking his statistics so far as complete, and making careful estimate of the other places, there must be about 25,000 refugees in Bulgaria. Mr. Vecheff reckons that about half the refugees have need of food, and the Bulgarian Government is now supplying the half in this region with bread or flour. Aside from this there is need of clothing and bedding for the immediate supply of at least 16,000. This gives only a passable supply to only a fourth of the refugees. Taking these datas for all Macedonia, and including the above, there is now at once needed:

For bedding and clothing	$54,400
In Macedonia, if food be given to one-half of the 60,000 sufferers, at $1.50 per month, it amounts to	90,000
If in the spring to each fifty persons a pair of oxen be given, at the price I paid in 1877, of $40 a pair, it would cost	33,000
And if $10 for each ten persons to help to build a home, making	85,000
A total of	$262,400

This is but a meagre estimate.

"The central committee is a union of different organizations in Sofia, which at first acted independently. The Macedonian Committee are also raising a special fund for the refugees, and noted among all is Madame Bahmetieff, a warm-hearted American lady, the wife of the Russian Consul-General at Sofia, who has repeatedly been among the first to meet fugitives with helpful donations from Russia and the cheer of her own personal sympathy. Bourgas and the surrounding region is specially favored by representatives from the Society of Friends in England. Mrs. M. A. Marriage Allen, who spent months in helping the Armenian refugees in 1896, giving also freely from her own means, having then gained the full sympathy of the ladies of the city, they have now cordially gathered around her to help prepare work for the Macedonian refugee women. She has as associate another lady, Mrs. G. King Lewis, who has had much experience in the segregation camps in South Africa. By their request the writer is aiding them, having joined them in Sofia.

"The greatest need by far is in Macedonia, where the people are unable to flee to a friendly region. There circumstances are such as to lead to despair. I wonder that they are not crushed by all they have endured.

"In many places in Macedonia a house can be built of common wicker-work, plastered inside and out, and covered with a straw roof, at little expense. If a pair of cattle for draught were available (costing in many places from $40 to $100), the only need would be to buy nails and pay skilled workmen from $5 to $10 for each house. The pair of cattle would do for a dozen families. The buildings would be permanent—not palaces, but just such homes as the people now live in. This would give each house one room 15x20 feet. In 1876, I, through agents and others employed, put up possibly 1,000 houses in Oc tober and Noven ber.

"Last night Mrs Allen gave th women listed her as needy each pair of shoes. Th thirty-five pair cos about $20. Th delegate gave ski sandals to thirty one men at a cos of $7. I think shall send them some carded wool one-half pound each, at a cost o perhaps $20. Thi I regard as one o the very best way of giving help, fo it gives work i spinning and knit ting. J. F. CLARKE," "Bourgas, Bulgaria, Nov. 24.

Rev. Lewis Bond, writing from Monastir, Nov. 4, says:

"Mr Haskell writes of a hospital for the wounded at Och rida, 'when the schools were not in session the lady teacher acted as nurses. Their yesterday's supply of food from th Bishop was ten para's worth of bread each. Most of the pa tients are badly wounded women. They had no fires, n kerosene for lights at night, and the government doctor wa dressing their wounds once in three or four days.'

"In another letter Mr. Haskell says, 'By Mr. Brailsford request I am to start Thursday to visit the fourteen Deburtsa villages, and he is going to Malesia. Mrs. Brailsford wi stay here and oversee the hospital or visit near villages There are 968 refugees in the city whom the bishop esti mates to be very needy, People come in rags and tears t beg for food who he says can get along for the present.

"It has been a hard day's work, giving flour to 1,000 peo ple—the hardest part being to refuse the 400 or 500 wh clamored for it and had to be denied. L. BOND."

Describing the relief work at Resna, Mr. Haskell writes:

"The head man of four burned villages gave me a written list of the names of households and number of souls in each family. All houses in each village were burned. The firs sixty-seven houses, 304 people refugees; sixty houses, 35 refugees; seven houses, sixty-nine refugees; eighty-five houses 429 refugees. Most of these refugees are scattered in six o the neighboring cities and villages.

"A great crowd of women, with some children and some men, were waiting outside the inn. But the carts with relie provisions did not arrive till 3 p.m., and by the time ther were unloaded, the carters paid, etc., it was too late to begi distribution. But it seemed to me a case where our Saviou certainly would not delay for the Sabbath, so I invited th people to come next day, Sunday morning.

"On Sunday morning a solid mass of people banke against the closed shops opposite, awaiting us. We begar our relief work with villagers from Podmochani, the hea man calling them up. We had a tin measure for flour, hold ing about five pounds. For present need we gave one mea ure to two people. We gave out two of our bales o goat's hair and woolen bed-rugs to twenty-three families, and then were compelled to reserve the others for other villages Roughly, the number of families supplied with bedding wa as follows: Podmochani 23; Ebla 12; Doupeni 6; Lavtsi 3 Volkodereh 1. Total 45. One or two may have got of unrecorded. The kind doctor appeared and made sure o covering for the three wounded women and one man whom he is treating. Twenty-five bags of flour were given t twelve villages—1,382 people. Even after the bedding wa all gone, people kept pleading for it. I think I never did s much good in seven hours in my life as to-day; nor did ever refuse so many desperately needy people."

In a later letter (November 29) Mr. Bond writes:

"The British Ambassador at Con stantinople agrees to the proposition of Hilmi Pasha, that a Turkish office be present at all our distributing de pots, and in attendance on distributin agents when visiting the villages.

"The loudest cry at present is fo bed-covering. We are buying in sev eral places, but can't keep up with th demand. We hope 3,000 or 4,00 second-hand army blankets fro London will be here within a week.

"I hope more funds will come speed ily, as the amount in hand will vanis quickly. I enclose statistics of sev en teen villages of Deburtsa, visited b Mr. Haskell, calling for over 2,00 blankets, large and small. Mrs. Brail ford telegraphs for 400 sacks of flou and all the blankets we have, and $5 cash. In this work there is no relie to the pain of refusing."

Every contribution made throug THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for th work of Macedonian relief, will b acknowledged in these column and forwarded by cable to the mis sionaries in the field. THE BULGARIAN ARMY GOING INTO WINTER QUARTERS

After its long virgil on the border, during the Macedonian crises, the Bulgarian army has now gone into winter quarters. It will be summoned to active duty again in the spring, unless Turkey assumes a more conciliatory attitude on the Macedonian question.

MOTHER BIRD'S NESTLINGS

By MARY SARGENT HOPKINS

DEAR Mother Bird, will you tell me something of your nestlings; some story of one whom you have saved, or been instrumental in saving, from the dreary life of misery in which you found her?"

This I asked of the sweet-faced, white-haired woman who presides over the "White Door," the Gospel settlement on the East Side of New York City, as we sat together one quiet Sunday evening, in her room. From visiting the Bowery Mission and the "Settlement" I had become intensely interested in the work of redemption going on there; but I wanted to individualize, to carry away with me one or two pictures like a clear-cut cameo, standing out in pure relief against the dark background of the dismal, wretched life all about us. I have said we were sitting together on a quiet Sunday evening. Yes, it was quiet where we were, for the windows were closed; but outside on the streets there was the same never-ceasing activity, the same murmur of restless humanity which marks the "Ghetto." Down stairs some of the devoted settlement workers were joining in a song service with the children gathered in from the street, and in the pauses of the music we could hear the happy voices and laughter of unrestrained childhood, something there is not room for in their crowded tenement-house homes.

MRS. SARAH J. BIRD

As the merry sounds floated up the stairway, Mother Bird spoke in answer to my request.

"Yes," she said, "I will try and tell you of some instances where a lifetime of effort would have been repaid with the happy results. Do you hear the particularly insistent tone of one of those girls? The sound reminds me of the answer one of the children made when I once asked the class what they had done to try and be better children—to encourage their teachers in helping and caring for them—one girl answered, 'I got glad on a girl I was mad on.' That seemed quite satisfactory to me, for I knew and realized what it meant for that girl to quell her temper and oust the demon of anger, so that she could get 'glad.' If one would look into the dark, ill-smelling tenements where these children sleep—it cannot be said that they live there—one would wonder how even in their short lives all the bright-eyed vivacity of childhood had not been crushed and killed, leaving them dull of eye and inferior in intellect. Not so, however. Most of these children are preternaturally bright, and some of them are almost phenomenally quick of comprehension. Their mental equipment seems to be much better than their moral—it is easier for them to comprehend a subject that perhaps has never been brought to their attention before than it is to discriminate between right and wrong, for while they may know the right, such has their home training been, that they will always choose the wrong if it is to their interest to do so."

But, you may ask, does this discourage Mother Bird in her protecting care of these nestlings? Not a bit, for she is sure that the constant dropping of kindness will wear away the stoniest obstacles in the path of right-living for these little ones.

They have so much to contend against, heredity, environment, and the nurture and admonition of the streets: but with all these conditions to fight, dear Mother Bird never loses courage or faith, although as she said, with a patient little sigh, "They do not all turn out good, and sometimes when we have followed up a young girl who is traveling Satan's highway, sick and sore of heart, the despair in her heart showing through all the paint and powder with which she has striven to hide the ravages of drink and disease: sometimes when we have won her apparently from all this degradation, and helped and healed her, hoping that she will cling to the new, clean life, she will suddenly disappear, and we never hear from her again. Lost in the depths."

A LITTLE GROUP OF THE NESTLINGS

"But," I said, "there must be many a girl whom you have rescued who has never returned to the old life?" "Oh yes," Mrs. Bird answered; "but" (and here the real mother's heart spoke), "I must be very guarded in telling those stories, they are as sacred to me as would be the histories of my own children, had I ever been a mother."

Then she told me of some young women who had emerged from the darkness of sinful lives, who are now happy matrons, living in homes of their own

One very interesting story Mrs. Bird told with honest pride, and this was of a young Jewish girl who had attended the "White Door" Settlement classes some years ago. She was only a child when she first came (and it is among the children, the nestlings, that Mother Bird finds hope and encouragement) she was one of many children of Jewish parents, who all lived huddled together in a typical East Side tenement. Rachel was the eldest child, and from the time when she made her first appearance at the "White Door," her ability to absorb lessons in the new way of living was remarkable, and would put to shame many a girl born and bred amid most whole some surroundings. Nothing escaped Rachel's eye, and nothing seemed beyond her immediate comprehension. Her lessons were not only learned, but were put into practical use. Her family must have been astonished beyond measure at the new ideas of living which she had imbibed at the Settlement, and which she put into practical working as far as she could. She soon became a leader among the girls in her own neighborhood. She combined the force and ability of two or three ordinary girls. She began to speak at the different meetings and to write little articles for the press. One of the latter in particular Mrs. Bird said was really remarkable. The subject was the Twentieth Century Woman of the East Side. The writer had only to draw from life as she saw it all around her. Women gossiping around the neighborhood, while their numerous children made the streets their playground, returning only to their noisome dwellings to huddle down in some dark corner to sleep. Other women who went out to earn a pittance, while their husbands drank here and passed away their days and nights in gambling and dissipation, which ran riot in the crazy East Side tenements. Truly Rachel knew whereof she spoke and could testify of what she had seen.

In looking over a number of these contributions, the astonishing fact of children at the settlement of wee stock by the unmistakable signs of intelligence far beyond their years which shone from the faces of these little ones. They are very masterful, these East Side boys and girls, with a clearly defined idea that they are born to rule and although they seldom resort to force as a ready running and decent are weapons which they never hesitate to use to gain their ends until they have learned the lessons of trade. A little story illustrates this fact and the children's consciousness of it. A teacher in a mission school near the "White Door," which is situated upon a Bible lesson, pauses and vast swarms of flies descended on the face and crawled into the corners of the eyes and mouths of the children and covered their tables and all their food, but (impossible) there were no flies on the children at Israel."

Small boy—"Please, teacher, there ain't none now either."

These children of the Ghetto, these nestlings that are nurtured out of their nests before their wings are feathered, are patterned in by their having been mothers—and how they succeeded her!

Once a little pathetic voice asked: "Why can't I love my mother as I do you?" Poor little mite, she could not understand that kindness and love begat love, and in the crowded, unwholesome, ill-ventilated rooms where those poor people live, where the very air reeks with broken, distorted, diseased humanity, there is small chance for even the flower of maternal love to survive the wretched surroundings.

The happy hours spent with gentle Mother Bird and her faithful assistants of the Kitchen Garden, and other classes, the music and the atmosphere of love which pervades the whole establishment, are making impressions upon the child mind which will color their whole after lives.

Would there were more Mother Birds, to whom nameless, sinful, neglected nestlings might fly for love and protection.

PORTO RICO'S QUEER SANTA CLAUS

HE IS DRESSED IN DUCK, AND DRAWN BY FIRE FLIES INSTEAD OF THE TRADITIONAL REINDEER

THE jury system, American government, financial institutions and American ideas are not the only things Uncle Sam has given to Porto Rico. Among the other notable things he has given that little island is the Christmas tree. Six years ago, the Christmas tree was only known to Porto Rico by the medium of pictures. They were never used before that time. The Christmas tree, as an annual institution, first saw light of day when Mr. B. R. Dix, Assistant Treasurer of the island, brought one there as a surprise to his little boy, Justin, lighting its candles on the night of December 24, 1898. Mr. Dix gave a large party in honor of the occasion, a number of the leading American officials and some Porto Rican neighbors taking part in the celebration.

The idea at once took hold of the impressionable Porto Ricans, and they forthwith declared their intention of having trees for their next Christmas. Of course, with the Christmas tree came the traditional story of Santa Claus. Imagine, if you can, a picture of Santa, minus fur robes and sled drawn by reindeers over a blanket of snow, and put him instead in a garb of white duck, drawn through the air on pretty fire-flies, and coming through an open window instead of a fireplace. Like our Santa Claus of the North, he comes loaded with toys; but because little Porto Rico is so poor, his load as yet is not a very heavy one.

With the introduction of the Christmas tree, there came a change in the old Porto Rican holiday. What is known as "Three Kings' Day" falls between the 6th and 10th of January. On this day, all enmities are buried, friendships are wreathed in smiles, and hearts are full of joy. Husbands and wives, sisters and brothers, and sweethearts interchange little tokens of esteem and love. "Three Kings' Day" is now celebrated only by the orthodox Spanish, who absolutely refuse to accept American innovations. the great majority of the Porto Rican people having rallied around December 25, lending all their enthusiasm to making Christmas Day the happiest of the year. Every steamer going to Porto Rico just before Christmas, now carries large quantities of our pretty pines to grace the parlors of the Porto Ricans.

The custom of giving presents on Christmas Day has opened up an entirely new field in the Porto Rican social conditions. Previous to the American occupation, a native young lady would not have given or received a gift from a young man; but now this is all changed, and presents are freely given and received. More fans are given as presents than anything else. A young lady's social position can be gauged by the number and quality of the fans she possesses. Every kind of a fan imaginable, from the Japanese paper fan to the most costly lace-covered and hand-painted kind, is used in Ponce.

Christmas

ONCE more Christmas is with us, bringing joy and gladness into the home and into hearts young and old. It is good to make it a happy time, and to have the children associate it with pleasures and new acquisitions of toys and childhood's treasures. They ought to learn as early as possible how much the event we celebrate means to us. They soon understand that the reason we are trying to make them happy, is that we ourselves have special cause for happiness, and they should know what it is.

The world could not afford to let the year pass, without one day being set apart for the commemoration of the sublimest fact in its history. He came into the world, God manifest in the flesh. How much it means to all mankind! Take from our present civilization all that has its origin in that fact, and how poor this world would be! The eternal life that He came to impart, is the transcendent fact; but the present life, too, has gained beyond conception by his coming. The kindness, the charity, the compassion, the sense of brotherhood which are slowly and feebly coming to fruition, were born in that Bethlehem manger. And how those influences survive! Even now, after nineteen centuries, their power is mighty, and they are becoming more potent year by year. Every generation has understood better than its predecessor the grandeur and beauty of that wonderful life, the beginning of which we celebrate at Christmas. What it was in the previous time, of which John writes in the first chapter of his Gospel, is beyond the grasp of our minds, but when it began in human form, it came near to us, and showed us what our nature was capable of when it enshrined the divine. From that time we have had an ideal by which to estimate men. Since then the world has applauded many unworthy characters; but those whose names live, and whose memory is cherished, are those who have been most like Him.

Since that first Christmas the world has been no longer an orphan world. His coming taught us that the Everlasting Father takes an interest in it and yearns for its development. The angel song that the shepherds heard, was a message of paternal affection; the star that guided the wise men to the manger was a celestial envoy to lead the steps of our race to the source of all light. Into the cold and the darkness of the Far-country where humanity had wandered, came that proclamation of amnesty, inviting us back to the Father's House of many mansions, and by supreme condescension He appeared, who as the way, the truth, and the life, gives us access to the supernal glory. Yes, we do well to celebrate Christmas; it was the birthday not of Christ alone, but of the new and perfect manhood to which the ages are slowly and painfully climbing.

In our celebration, let Christ have his place. Pleasure and business and social engagements fill our lives; but we have not now the excuse of the inn that there is no room for Him. He is the one guest for whom we will make room; for every heart into which He is born is transformed into the presence chamber of the King of kings, and where He dwells there are pleasures for evermore.

Let Christ be the Centre

OUR thoughts are not random and elusive as we often suppose them to be. They fall under the law of cause and effect, as truly as the blossom on the bough and the fruit on the tree. Or, to use a more correct figure, we may say our thoughts have centres and orbits, and they move in courses determined by the law of spiritual gravitation.

Among the curious records of recent astronomy, there is one concerning a strange star of the second magnitude which has been called the Demon star, because of the unaccountable variations in its brilliancy. It appeared to be an outlaw in the firmament, submitting to no control. But at last its eccentricities have been explained, and have resolved themselves into a starry order. Astronomers have discovered that Algol revolves around a centre which they cannot see, and that all its movements are regulated by this invisible, and hitherto unsuspected centre.

So we may be sure all our thoughts have a centre. Find that, and you find the secret of any man's life. Let Christ be the centre, the real centre of our being and doing in this world—the true sun and pivot of our life—and then it cannot be but that our every thought will be brought into captivity to him; judgment, imagination, will, desire, purpose; all the streams of action will be sanctified, and others will take knowledge of us, that we have been with Jesus.

A Golden Barrier

A CORRESPONDENT writes to inquire why—almost all the religious effort that is put forth by the various denominational bodies, and by the undenominational as well, is aimed at the "lower classes?" I know that the poor are not what they ought to be, religiously speaking; but, on the other hand, cannot the same thing be said, and probably, with still greater force, of the rich? In a word, if the rich were made to understand and appreciate their privileges, and persuaded to perform their duties as Christian men and women, would it not greatly simplify the task of evangelizing the poor? And this argument receives added force, when we consider the fact that the rich are directly responsible to a large extent, for the pinching poverty and hard lives of the poor, and must, therefore, bear the blame for much of the unrighteousness, that seems to find a fruitful soil in wretched and discouraging surroundings. Let the churches and the evangelists try for a season, the effect of a religious movement for the conversion of the rich.

This letter, though it might be regarded by some as the product of a mind warped by envy and discontent, yet contains one wholesome truth. To convert any considerable proportion of the rich and influential members of a community would be a long step toward ameliorating the condition of the poor in that community. Awakened Christian sympathy would result in such an improvement as would quickly make itself felt. There are, fortunately, instances on every hand of rich men and women making a noble use of the wealth they have honorably acquired. They recognize their trusteeship and employ their means largely in benevolence and philanthropy, in aiding the less fortunate to self-support, and in giving employment to large numbers. Such men are a blessing to a community. They are not to be confounded with the mere money-getters, those whose faculty of acquiring wealth has been developed to an extent that becomes a menace to all with whom they come in contact—whose hearts seem to have grown hard and dead in the process of building up colossal fortunes. How difficult it is to kindle such hearts into spiritual life, the Saviour himself acknowledged. Their gold stands between them and the Kingdom, like an insurmountable barrier, and it would often seem that the only time to reach them is when some great, towering breaker of misfortune has dashed down the barrier and swept their riches suddenly away. When panic comes, and men sustain severe financial losses; when their wealth takes wings and they find themselves reduced to the common level of poverty and dependence, their hearts grow tender, and they more readily yield to Gospel influences.

There are always more poor than rich, and always will be. To-day, as in Christ's day, the Gospel is proclaimed most largely to the humble, because now, as then, "the common people" hear it gladly, and give it most cordial welcome. Jesus cast his lot with the poor, and his servants rightly follow his example. They give the Gospel the widest proclamation, among all sorts and conditions of men, without distinction, neglecting no class; and if they find that their most fruitful spiritual field is among the common people, they do not complain. They often have the joy of seeing the barriers of wealth and position broken down by the power of the Holy Spirit, and the hearts of the rich melted and made as tender as that of a little child.

Among the Workers

—FOUR THOUSAND persons, according to the local newspapers, attend the extra service for men each Sabbath afternoon in the Bijou Theatre, Pittsburgh, conducted by Pastor S. Edward Young, of the Second Presbyterian Church. Hundreds of hands are raised for prayer at the end of the service.

—FOR ABOUT a year, nothing has been heard from Rev. Lewis P. Clinton (Somayou), the African Prince, who established a mission in Forteville, Grand Bassa, West Africa; but a letter was lately received, saying the work was "going on finely," and asking that school-books be sent for use in his school.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Death of Two Notable Men

ON the same day, the United States and Great Britain each lost from among its citizens, a man eminent in his respective sphere, who, throughout a long life had made a profound impression on contemporary thought. Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull, the editor of the Sunday School Times for nearly thirty years, and the author of many well-known works on the practical working of the Sunday School, and on scenes in the Holy Land, had laid Christian workers under a tremendous obligation. Scarcely a Sunday School teacher in the land has not been indebted to him for the enterprise with which he sought the best light available on the lessons, procuring from America and Europe, the utterances of the men best qualified to speak on special Biblical topics, while he showed how those utterances might be used in teaching. It was a great work, intensely practical, and its effect on the children who benefited by it in the beginning, and becoming themselves teachers afterwards, were benefited by his later labors, was prodigious. Not in criticism, not in speculation, was his work done; but in getting from every available source, light on the sacred pages, and advising and instructing teachers in their work. No slight part of the potent influence of the Sunday School on the life of our time is owing to Dr. Trumbull, who, at the age of seventy-three, has now ended his service.

Great Britain's loss is of another kind. Herbert Spencer, the most eminent philosopher she has yet produced, whose works were and even in Germany, commanded respect, died on December 8, at the age of eighty-three. No less than forty-three years ago, Mr. Spencer, already well-known to students and philosophers as a man of remarkable powers, sketched out a plan of philosophical work, which astonished every one by its scope and variety. He was then, as he had been all his life, an invalid, and it was his own dread, that he would not live to cover the immense field he had mapped out. One department only was dropped from his original scheme, owing to advanced age and the decline of his health. All the remainder was carefully and most elaborately executed. He called it Synthetic Philosophy, and the name was well chosen. He was not an original observer; but utilizing the discoveries and observations of other men, he undertook to show how all were consistent with his theory, and to build up, out of the materials supplied by specialists in their respective fields, a system of philosophy. The scheme embraced not only biology, but the development of man in his psychological, moral and sociological relations. Evolution, in Spencer's opinion, was the key to the whole, and his effort was to show how men and animals and institutions had come to their present condition through the same law. Outside this realm of visible phenomena, he recognized the existence of some mighty force, but of this force he declared that men knew and could know nothing. Thus he rejected or ignored revelation, and was therefore emphatically an agnostic. There is no basis for comparison between the two men: but there is an immense contrast in the effects of their teaching. From Mr. Spencer, the philosophic world heard that the very existence of God is "unknown and unknowable": while from Dr. Trumbull, we heard the message that Paul gave to the philosophers at Athens:

> Whom, therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you, . . . that they should seek the Lord if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us (Acts. 17:23, 27).

Britain and Thibet

The accompanying picture is reproduced by the London Graphic, from a photograph taken by an officer in the British Thibetan expedition. It shows the arrival of the messengers of the Lama, forbidding the nearer approach of the armed escort of the British envoys to Lhasa. The messengers were received with every token of respect, but their message was evidently a disappointment to the British Commander. It is now officially announced that the expedition which is being prepared will not attempt at present to penetrate to Lhasa, but will proceed as far as Gyangtse, which is about one hundred and fifty miles from the capital. The Thibetan Government has been assured that the British occupation of that town will not be permanent, but will continue until the treaty, which has been negotiated, is duly signed. A letter, it is stated, has been sent to the Lama by the ruler of the native State of Nepaul, who is on the most friendly terms with the Lama. He advises the Lama to make friends with the British, and assures him that great advantages have accrued to Nepaul through British relations. All that has been disclosed indicates that the expedition which is to be sent is not the result of the British desire to annex Thibet, but of a suspicion that Russia is about to get control of it and so approach India. The British Government is said to prefer that Thibet should maintain its independence, but is determined that it shall not fall into Russian hands, as Manchuria has done. Thus Thibet will probably have to surrender her long-cherished seclusion, either peaceably by a commercial treaty, or by force set in motion by British doubts of its complicity in the designs of her historic enemy for territorial aggrandizement. Whether British suspicions are justified or not it trouble ensues Thibet is likely to suffer through the envy and jealousy of its two powerful neighbors.

Good Money Rejected

A singular spectacle was witnessed on Broadway, New York, a few days ago. It was that of a man offering money to people who refused it. Some months ago a hard-working man who gets his living by attending to furnaces became somewhat eccentric, but his whims were regarded as harmless. He conceived the idea of giving the children of the streets a treat. He asked his employers to save for him all the bright pennies they had. He said he meant to distribute them to the boys at Christmas. The idea took hold of him, and he talked a good deal about the fun he would have, and the delight the boys would have in scrambling for them. He dwelt on the notion until it took a wilder shape. He resolved to give all his savings away, and he could not wait for Christmas. Going up to Broadway he took a twenty-dollar bill from his pocket and offered it to a well-dressed man whom he met. The man brushed him aside, as did another to whom he offered it. Irritated by the rebuffs he tried several others, but no one would take it. "It is good money," he shouted, "take it. I don't want it. It is a real joke and I want no fun." People laughed at him, and a crowd of boys jeered him. The man grew more and more excited. "If you will not take it as a gift," he said, "sell me five for $1." He offered good silver bills for a specified number, but no one would have his money. At the police station he told his story, and asked to be locked up. He was released, and made to understand that in this day, when money is so passionately desired, a man could not get people to accept it as a free gift. It is impossible to say what the right way of explaining it is that chose to refuse so good a proposal. It could not be because it is too common. The rarer should keep its many times greater blessing. The free offer of salvation is inconceivable to them, and they die to save it.

Queen Alexandra's Peril

People on this side the Atlantic, who know the character of the public and press in this country, will not wonder that the women who is now Queen of Great Britain, will feel with British sentiment in regarding that her Majesty escaped the great peril to which she was recently exposed. On the night of December 10 she was sleeping at her home at Sandringham, where she lived for so many years as Princess of Wales. Her secretary, Miss Knollys, who occupied a room in the adjoining suite that of the Queen, was awakened in the early morning by the smell of fire and the confusing sensation of a smoke-filled room. She was alarmed by seeing flames creeping along the ceiling. She realized the danger of the Queen and hurried upstairs to her Majesty's room. She found her servants sound asleep and the smoke in that room growing dense. The two ladies hurriedly dressed and gave the alarm to the other inmates of the mansion. The servants formed a fire-brigade, and after some hours' work extinguished the flames, but not until the floor of the Queen's room had collapsed and the bed in which she had been sleeping had fallen into the floor below. It is considered that a crossed electric wire had set a beam on fire, which had smouldered for some time before breaking into a flame. The general opinion is that a fatal catastrophe was averted, is an evidence that the Queen's popularity is not all gone due to Lady Isabella's action, but to the fact that she fills the Sceptre and heart of the good woman, in at least one respect.

BRIEF NOTES

"THE BOY OF BOYS" ❋ BOYHOOD OF JESUS

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR JAN. 3
LUKE 2: 40-52

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--LUKE 2: 52: "JESUS INCREASED IN WISDOM AND IN STATURE AND IN FAVOR WITH GOD AND MAN."

WHEN Jesus was born, wise men in the East saw his star, and sought him out that they might worship him. When Jesus had grown to be twelve years of age, other wise men—the doctors of divinity of Jerusalem—conversing with Jesus, as he sat in their midst on the Temple terrace leading to the Court of Israel, "both hearing them and asking them questions," "wondered at his understanding and answers." He had probably not been seen in the Temple since he was carried there in the arms of his mother when he was forty days old. At that time the aged Simeon had spoken of him to God as he held him in his arms, as "a light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people, Israel." The occasion of this second visit to the Temple was that he might become "a son of the law," by a ceremony incumbent upon all Jewish boys at twelve years of age, after which they entered into all religious duties with their elders. Such a relation is to be compared with what in our day is called "joining the church." Doubtless other boys of that age had come from Nazareth for the same ceremony.

It will be interesting to recall the religious training of the boy Jesus. He was the Son of God, but his divinity was so wrapped up in his humanity, that, in the days of his boyhood, there were no manifestations of his divine power. Many foolish legends have been invented, for example, that he moulded little birds out of clay in his play, and then gave them life and made them fly. But in fact "he played as little children play the pleasant games of youth." Following the custom of all faithful Jewish mothers, Mary must have begun teaching him the law of God when he was five years of age. At ten years of age he undoubtedly began to study the Mishna in some synagogue school. Through such teaching he "grew in favor with God and man." He was doubtless an extremely earnest pupil, and probably astonished his teacher long before he did the doctors in the Temple.

Nazareth, where he was brought up, was a favorable location for a boy desiring to know of the world, for it was on the highway of nations. The town itself nestled among the hills, through which were laid out great roads that were thronged with travelers; the road to Jerusalem, crowded often with pilgrims; the road from Egypt, with its merchant caravans; the highway between Acre and Damascus, "along which legions marched, and princes swept with their retinues." As a boy, Jesus undoubtedly saw many of these travelers, and asked questions, and so learned much. From the tops of those hills the history of the Jewish nation was spread out before him as a living map. The different historic localities must often have been pointed out to him by Mary and Joseph.

There were also political struggles in the land during his boyhood. A man named Judas led an insurrection against King Herod. Jewish youths were urged by Judas to pull down all those works which the king had erected, contrary to the law of their fathers. The boy Jesus had no doubt heard how they had actually pulled down and broken in pieces a golden Roman eagle which King Herod had caused to be placed over the gate of the Temple. The place where the detested thing had been only two years before, was no doubt pointed out to him when he went up to Jerusalem at twelve years of age.

When it was shown him by his mother and Joseph that it was his duty to return to Nazareth with them, he promptly obeyed. He had not disobeyed them by remaining behind in Jerusalem, but was in that obedient to a Higher Power, and about his "Father's business." The journey homeward to Nazareth was less momentous than the journey out had been, for that had been made in company with pilgrims. But the panorama through which they journeyed was the same: the Holy City, with gilded roof and marble colonnades towering over all; Bethel, where Jacob had his dream, the little town of Gibeah, where Saul lived when he was made king; the fertile valley between Ebai and Gerizim, the historic mountains of blessing and cursing; Jacob's well, where they doubtless stopped to refresh themselves; Samaria, glorious in the beauty of vines, forming its "crown of pride;" the ancient town of Engannim; the sandy plain of Esdraelon, famous for its historic battles; Jezreel, which recalled incidents in the life of Elisha; Mount Tabor, where Deborah prayed while Barak descended to fight; and the ancient river Kishon, where God had discomfited Sisera. They came at last to their own beautiful Nazareth valley, in top of the hills, carpeted as with a High Priest's robe of blue, purple and scarlet, with innumerable flowers. They had traveled eighty miles between Jerusalem and Nazareth, and Jesus was at home again to spend eighteen years in the work of a carpenter, all the while growing in favor with God and man. Then he would take up his "Father's business" as his sole occupation.

Illustration and Application

The learned Erasmus once wrote a speech in Latin for a boy to speak, beginning, "We boys commemorate the boy of boys—our Master, Jesus, the chief ideal of all, but particularly the chief of us, that is, of boys." That may well be the central thought of this lesson, which, from another point of view, is also a lesson for parents. Having traversed the facts of the lesson story, let us consider,

First: Right and wrong views of the mother of Jesus;
Second: Right and wrong views of the boyhood of Jesus.

Mary "blessed" but not to be worshiped

I. We should not worship Mary, but honor her as a "blessed" example of motherhood. Two recent incidents are suggestive. One is the published prayer of the new Pope to Mary: "Most Holy Virgin, who pleased our Lord, and became his mother, immaculate in body and soul, in faith and love, this solemn jubilee of the proclamation of the Dogma, which announced thee to the universal world as conceived without sin, mayest regard those miserable ones who implore thy potent patronage! The malevolent Serpent, against which was hurled the first curse, continues, unfortunately, to combat and insinuate itself among the suffering children of Eve; mayest thou, O our blessed Mother, our Queen and Advocate, who since the first instant of thy conception, crushed the head of the enemy, gather thy prayers, which, united with thee in only one heart, we implore thee to present at the throne of God, that we may never yield to the insinuations which assail us, so that we shall all arrive at the harbors of everlasting life, and, in the midst of many dangers, the Church and Christian society, shall sing once more the hymn of liberation, victory and peace. Amen."

Surely Mary cannot be pleased to have such worship offered to her in place of her Divine Son and Lord, but would approve rather the act of that Protestant preacher who, on a recent Sunday, stopped his thoughtless choir when they struck up the idolatrous "Ave Maria," often sung without rebuke in Protestant churches. One day, when Jesus was busy with his Divine miracles and teaching, and some one interrupted him to say, "Thy mother and thy brethren stand without seeking thee." Jesus gave a reply that put every faithful Christian in his list of Madonnas: "He that doeth the will of my Father, the same is my mother and sister and brother." There is not a word in Scripture to support the Roman Catholic theory that Mary herself was of "immaculate conception," that is, divinely born like her Son. She was wholly human. But let not the undue honors put on her prevent us from giving her due honor as a model mother, under whose wise oversight Jesus, a real human boy, though divine, grew symmetrically, in body, mind and spirit. It is said that "parents advertise themselves in their children." In the familiarity with the Bible that Jesus showed even in his boyhood, as he sat among the doctors in the Temple, in his prompt obedience to his parents, in his interest in great truths above holiday scenes, he showed how faithfully his mother had taught and trained him in his lowly home. She had given him what was better than wealth, high ideals and right habits. As in other homes that have raised men that blessed the world, it was a case of "plain living and high thinking."

A good mother's influence often extends to her children's children. It is said that no one had so much religious influence in the development of Francois Millet, painter of the "Angelus," as his grandmother. She was an old country woman of intense religious faith, living in God, seeing everything in God, seeing God in everything, and mingling God in every scene of nature and every act of life. One of Millet's earliest recollections was of his grandmother waking him when he was quite a small child, and saying to him: "Up, my little Francois! If you only knew what a long time the birds have been singing the glory of God!" When he had to leave home to go to Paris, his grandmother said: "I would rather see you dead than unfaithful to God's commands." At a later time, when he had begun to make his way in Paris, she reminded him again: "Remember, my Francois, that you were a Christian before you were a painter. Paint for eternity, and think that the trump which will call to Judgment is on the eve of sounding."

"AND HE WENT DOWN WITH THEM"

"THEY FOUND HIM IN THE TEMPLE SITTING AMONG THE DOCTORS"

If parents were as ready to make any needed sacrifice to save their children from moral perils as they are to save them from physical dangers, few children would go wrong. A farmer in North Carolina once drove with two high-mettled horses into town. Stopping in front of one of the stores, he was about to enter when his horses took fright. He sprang in front of them, and heroically seized the reins. Maddened by strange noises, the horses dashed down the street, the man still clinging to the bridles. On they rushed until the horses, wild with frenzy, rose on their haunches, and leaping upon the man, all came with a crash to the earth. When people came and rescued the bleeding body of the man, and found him in death's last agony, a friend, bending tenderly over him, asked, "Why did you sacrifice your life for horses and wagon?" He gasped with his breath, as his spirit departed, "Go and look in the wagon." They turned, and there, asleep in the straw, lay his little boy. As they laid the mangled form of the hero in his grave, no one said, "The sacrifice was too great."

Jesus a Real Boy

II. Jesus was a real boy, with nothing in his life that other boys cannot and should not copy. The Bible tells us he had "emptied himself" of his divineness for a time. The legends of miracles done by him in boyhood, as has been shown, were wholly false to his plan, to live a real human life that would show other boys and men what a human life might be. We talk about "making a living," but in his presence let us think of making a life.

First of all, he had a body unscarred by any evil habit. Artists who picture Jesus as physically thin and weak, have no warrant in Scripture for doing so. Think of the strength and beauty of a body never marred by sin! And his mind, too, though his schooling was meagre, was wise and alert because his uncorrupted body and his lofty soul both helped it to clear thinking. In encaustic tiles at the entrance to what was Tennyson's home in the Isle of Wight are the words, "Truth against the world." Such was the mental attitude of him who said, "I am the truth." At the completion of one of the Amherst College buildings, when President Hitchcock first assembled his geology class in a new recitation room with sky windows, this was his introduction to one of his best lectures: "Young gentlemen, all the light we have here comes from above." Students who are too much devoted to the study of things earthly, such as stones and bugs, and know so little of the Bible that they cannot understand references to it in Browning and Tennyson, should ponder that profound motto. Though Christ missed much of the earthly learning of his day, his mind was fearlessly open to the light from above. He proved that it is not necessary to be learned in order to be wise. But Jesus kept "spirit" above both "mind" and "body." An ancestral Japanese statue, now in this country, represents the soul by a pear-shaped, self-luminous jewel, flame-tipped, which is held in the hand as an object of devout contemplation. It is the soul that constitutes character, the chief element of a noble life.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. It is a really local experience, with the names only slightly veiled, and the facts easily recognizable. The great audience sits spell-bound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told. Over three thousand persons sign the pledge, as the result of the story. An explosion wrecks the Beacon office and press, and injures George. Douglas pluckily continues publication, with the aid of friends. Hopes brighten, and the outlook for the revived Beacon, and the cause it represents, gradually improves. The little temperance group at Colby hears of the approaching wedding of Esther and Douglas, which is shortly afterward celebrated very quietly. The women of Colby begin a vigorous temperance crusade. George becomes a cause of sorrow and anxiety by yielding to the temptation to drink. Douglas discharges him and the boy appeals to Esther.

DOUGLAS stood facing Esther, and for one moment he was tempted to a feeling of anger towards her. That soon passed away, and the feeling was transferred to George.

"What business had he to come to you with it?"

"Oh, but he is simply wretched over it. Give him another try, Frank. You cannot regret doing the uttermost to save him. For the sake of our boy, who may sometime need a friend, give George the benefit of the doubt. And he has no father or mother. His home life has been against him. Won't you, Frank?"

Douglas could not resist his young wife. He felt as if his judgment did not go with his feelings in yielding, but he finally did yield, and promised to let George stay on and see if he would respond to renewed friendship and forgiveness.

Copyright, 1903 by Charles M Sheldon.

So, the following evening Douglas asked George up to the house, and in the sacred and hospitable quiet of the little home circle he and Esther pledged the boy their help and sympathy, and made him feel that there were no grudges or things kept back. Douglas went a step farther, and promised the boy a rise in position at the end of the quarter, advancing him to a place in the office where he was in need of special help, with an increased correspondence brought about by the fast rising tide of temperance feeling that now promised to rise in a great flood and sweep the next legislature towards a prohibitory enactment.

For the next two weeks, George proved as model a young man as Douglas ever knew. He seemed transformed by the confidence reposed in him. Douglas did him the honor never to watch him. He was made to feel that the past was past, and not a word was ever said about it.

But at the end of the two weeks a change was noticed in him. He seemed to grow irritable, and several times flew into a passion with the galley-boy. He avoided Quits, and Quits at once reported his suspicion to Douglas, anxious to do what he could with Douglas to save him.

But Douglas was overwhelmed at that particular time with the pressure of work, and told Quits that George was on his good behavior, and he had not noticed anything out of the way with him.

Two nights after this talk with Quits, Douglas was going past Jake's place on his way home from the office. It was after ten o'clock, and the day after the regular issue of the Beacon. The pressmen were not all required to be down in the evening. George had been absent during the afternoon, and when he went away at noon, Douglas had not noted anything special about him.

But when he was opposite the swinging doors that opened in and out close by the sidewalk, a group of young men came out laughing and singing boisterously. In the midst of them was George, his face flushed and his legs reeling.

The smell of the beer, warm and nauseating to Douglas, was wafted out of the saloon as the crowd poured out on the sidewalk, and Douglas was hastening to go on, when a familiar laugh quickly stopped him.

The next minute he looked up and saw George. George recognized him at the same time, and a look of terror went into his face.

Without a word Douglas turned around and walked back towards the office. As he walked along he heard, behind, steps running towards him.

CHAPTER X.

DOUGLAS walked rapidly back to the office without turning around to see who it was that was following him. Before he reached the Beacon building, the sound of the steps had ceased. He went at once into the office room, shut the door, and sat down at the desk to fight out another battle along the narrow way of life.

The impulse that had turned him back from his way home at the sight of George, was not yet very clear to him. As he sat there for a few moments alone, however, it began to grow plainer. The sudden knowledge of the boy's lapse into his old habits came to him altogether as a shock, and, at first, his feeling was one of anger certainty after some sort of discussion he came close and pressed the key. He got up at once from the chair where he was sitting, came over to George and kneeled down by him, putting his arm over the boy's shoulder. After some repeated use on knees for him, preparing the boy's own instinctive seeking for himself.

"GEORGE FLUNG HIMSELF DOWN AT THE END OF THE DESK

After the first few sentences George ceased his cries and Douglas went on praying with earnest faith. When he had finished there was a moment of silence. Then George said:

"George, you must ask for yourself. It is not enough for me to pray. If you are saved from this curse, you must go to God direct yourself for help."

"Yes, yes, Mr. Douglas. I'll pray. I'll pray," George cried, and he began to make strange appeals, calling on God to save him.

He was not spoken a dozen words before Douglas realized with startling distinctness that the boy was not yet sober. The realization of this fact was so disconcerting to him that at first he had almost let go and withdrawn his arm from the boy's shoulder. That upon came to him with a flash of remembrance, what he had heard the President of the college say more than once from experience of all the missionary workers at Five Points, New York where hundreds of men have come and crowded down at the platform in a moment's mad while in a state of intoxication, and had been saved the next day. "Shall I dare to doubt the saving grace of the power of God?" questioned Douglas to an awful whisper in his own soul, and he instantly got down by George again.

"Don't go away, Mr. Douglas, will you?" George asked, grasping his arm as Douglas made some movement.

"No, no, George. I won't leave you. God will save you. Put your faith in him."

George prayed on again, and it took all the faith that Douglas possessed to believe that the answer to redemption could or would be among such surroundings. But a new sense came over him, a sense of something that was not himself, and he realized that the Father knows the heart of his children.

He helped George to his feet and very gently led him to the door. George had ceased to moan and still mumbled incoherently as he sat looking at Douglas, trembling as a whipped dog looks at his master.

Douglas picked up his hat.

"I want you to go home with me to-night, George," he said, controlling his voice.

"Home, Mr. Douglas?" George gasped, as if the word had not been used to him for years. "Do you think I can go home, Mr. Douglas?"

"Yes, I am sure he will," replied Douglas, as he grasped George and led him to the door, and keeping hold of him as they passed out.

Esther met them in the hall. She had heard George's voice, and realized the situation at once.

"You have brought Frank home, George?" she asked, and smiled through her tears.

"Yes, Douglas brought him to me with his own hands," George answered, gazing fondly at Esther, as if she were the incarnation of goodness.

Oh, what a blessing motherhood has sparkle in the eyes of a woman!

The Art of Giving Christmas Presents

FOR weeks past a foremost thought in the minds of a good many home-keeping women has been, "What shall I give my dear ones for Christmas?" Not, be it noticed, what shall I receive? Few spend much time and thought in wondering what enrichment of their personal treasures will come to them in the holiday season, but we are all disposed to do what we can to fill Christmas stockings, and help to load with presents the Christmas mails. Therefore, some words of counsel are timely now.

First of all we might, without violating the spirit of the hour, give a little thought to the people who are most likely to be neglected, who have few to love and care for them, and whose Christmas is often a very desolate time of the year. Take, for example, a most unfortunate group of people who keep timidly in the background and do not parade their grief in the eyes of the world. We have much sympathy when Christmas comes for prisoners, shut within the walls of gloomy fortresses, where, in order to pay their debts to society and undergo the penalty awarded for crime, they must spend weary years. Some of us annually write letters to cheer the prisoners, men we do not know, in the vague hope that our words may bring them a faint ray of light and consolation. But the prisoners are, after all, less to be pitied than their families, from whom the bread-winner has generally been taken by a fate more cruel than death. Disgrace cuts deeper and gives more pain than bereavement, and, little children who go to school, knowing that their fathers are in the penitentiary, must feel a shrinking from their fellows, whose fathers come honorably home every night, and go honorably forth to business every morning. There is no real Christmas possible for the wife and child of the convict, unless some good angel, like Mrs. Ballington Booth, or some of her kindly Volunteers, carry it to them. A bit of Christmas holly, tied upon a bag of flour or a ham; a ton of coal, sent on a cold morning; a warm garment, any bit of human kindness despatched to such a home, is the best kind of Christmas gift—a gift that God approves.

The little children of the very poor should be borne in mind at Christmas, and some cheer planned for them; some fun, as well as something useful sent to their homes.

One day, in Cherry street, New York, a little girl was seen crooning over a doll, which she had made of an empty bottle, around which she had tied the fragment of an old gray shawl. This was the only doll the little maiden had, but her imagination glorified it, and she made believe that it was the right thing. What joy a real doll could carry to such a little child as this! Especially if there were with it a change of clothing, a dress to put on and take off!

ON CHRISTMAS EVE

Sleep well, my dear ones, safe and free;
The holy angels are with thee,
Who always see thy Father's face,
And never slumber, nights nor days.

Your bed is soft in every way;
The Saviour lay in straw and hay;
Your chamber is far better drest
Than the hard crib where He did rest.

None dare disturb your quiet ease;
He had a thousand enemies.
You live in sweet security;
But He was punished, and for thee.

Adapted from the German of John Christian Jacobi.

Among the beneficiaries, whom I hope we have not forgotten, are the children in far-away India, China and Japan, in our missionary schools, and the little Indian children in Oklahoma and Dakota, and elsewhere on our great Western frontier. Christmas gifts for foreign shores should have gone to their destination some weeks ago. Nothing comes amiss to these distant children, who are made very happy by Christmas cards, books and toys, which have served their turn here in America. The great temptation at Christmas is to spend more than we can afford. If our list of friends is a large one, we are very apt to have a good many acquaintances beyond the pale of our kindred, to whom we love to send some token of affection in the joyous Christmastide. Though we spend only a trifle on each, the sum total aggregates largely, and we are likely to find ourselves somewhat circumscribed as to spending money later on, if we gratify our desire to be liberal at this time. The pity of it is that so often the gifts are merely looked at, laid aside and forgotten, giving only a momentary pleasure. A great many gifts are misfits. They do not at all carry with them the measure of utility which would complete them. A little thought would have made each gift appropriate to the need of the recipient. To aged eyes, for instance, it is foolish to send a Bible or other book in very fine print. To a person untrained in art, the picture which would carry delight to a girl who has been well trained in technique and color, may seem like rubbish. For instance, a woman whose ideas of art were very crude, remarked one day, "Anything in a frame that fills up a space on my wall is all that I want in the way of a picture." Fancy the horror of one who knows good pictures at such a statement as this!

Linen is always a delight to the heart of the housekeeper, and something for her table or her bedroom will be more than welcome to the average matron. China, laces, books, carvings, brasses in the shape of platters, or candlesticks, photograph frames, hand mirrors, fans and pretty things in general make pleasing presents to women. They like nearly everything.

Men are a little more limited, but even for them there are suitable Christmas gifts, in the shape of military brushes, leather bags, handkerchiefs, cushions, books, shaving sets, and opera glasses, and many other articles which they may use, or with which they may adorn their dens.

The element of fitness must enter a gift, or it is sure to be a disappointment. Apart from this, one should never feel a sense of obligation when giving a thing to a friend, or give because she thinks it will be expected, or send something as a return, or in any way with a thought of value received. The commercial touch utterly ruins a gift. Christmas should bring with it an overflowing heart of joy and good-will, and here the spirit is always more than the tangible token.

Something one may make herself with her own fingers, has more sentiment about it than a costlier article bought over the counter. Study a friend's taste as well as his or her needs, before sending forth your holiday gift. M. E. S.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

F. M. B., Great Falls, Mont. "I wish to express my thankfulness to God for answered prayers."

Reader, Schenectady, N.Y. "I desire to acknowledge God's saving power to restore both body and spirit."

Reader, San Jose, Calif. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering my prayers in a wonderful manner."

Old Subscriber, S Dak. "I have received many answers to my prayers all through a long life of over seventy years."

B. P., Newark, N. J. "I want to tell you of the great help the 'Answered Prayers' have been to me. Recently the days seemed dark (I teach music, and am dependent upon that for my livelihood), and I earnestly prayed to God asking him to send me the help I so much needed. His answer came almost immediately. And in so many ways has he helped me, that I feel I must tell the world, and perhaps my experience may be helpful in encouraging some one else to take all to God in prayer."

Reader, Lowville, N. Y. "I have read the Answered Prayer column in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and would like to add my testimony to that of the many others who have publicly acknowledged that their prayers have been answered. Only this summer, when a great grief seemed to threaten me, I took the matter to God in prayer, and the trouble was removed. I know he does hear and answer prayer."

Mrs. E. B., Acona, Miss. "I have many times had answers to prayer. I promised the Lord that I would tell it to the world. I thank God for his goodness to me."

S. B., W. Va. "I know that God answers prayer. I was in deep trouble and went to the Lord in prayer when I was almost in despair, and he answered, as he always will answer a faithful plea. All honor and glory be unto his name."

Reader. "God surely hears and answers our prayers. We were in great trouble some time ago and we prayed to our Heavenly Father, and he answered and helped us wonderfully. Praise his holy name."

Reader, Inka, Ill. "I want to acknowledge publicly God's goodness in answering my prayers. Praise his name."

Mrs. A. M. S., Berkeley, Calif. "I wish to acknowledge publicly the many answers to my prayers. I am a firm believer in prayer, and I know that our Heavenly Father hears and answers prayer, if we put our trust in him."

Mrs. C. M., Wilmington, Ill. "I have had so many blessed assurances, that I cannot doubt for a moment, that it was in answer to my prayers. David said: 'I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me.'"

I. M. E. "I wish to acknowledge my deep gratitude to God for his answer to prayer. He has answered many times for me. Praise his holy name."

Reader, Morland, Kans. "I want to tell to the world that God has heard and answered my prayers ever since I was a child, and to-day I can raise up my eyes (dimmed with tears, for I am passing through a great trial), to him and thank him for my affliction, for I know that it is for my good."

Miss F. N., Shady, Ark. "I wish to acknowledge God's wondrous love and tenderness in answering prayer for me. I was in great distress and I called upon the Lord, and he heard and answered my prayer."

Mrs. R. W., Cape Girardeau. "I must add my testimony to many others of the 'Answered Prayers' column, that it may strengthen some who are weak in the faith and cause them to draw more closely in prayer to our blessed Lord, for he will take heed and answer those who call upon him. 'I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. Glory be unto his holy name."

L. I. C., Menlo, Kan. "I promised the Lord if he would answer my prayer I would acknowledge it to the world. We had a great affliction. Praise God, he has answered my prayer. I feel that I want to pray without ceasing, and in all things give thanks."

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. Drinnin, an aged Christian and constant reader of this journal, passed away at Wyoming, Ill., lately, much regretted.

Miss Susan Keich, daughter of Margaret and the late George Keich, died at her home in Hazleton, Pa., November 22. She was born in 1854. When nine years of age she engaged in active Christian work in the United Brethren Church, in Tamaqua, Pa., and continued in the work until the time of her death. She lived a consistent and quiet Christian life. Realizing that her end was near at hand, she took consolation in repeating the twenty-third psalm. Her death was peaceful and calm.

A Satisfactory Investment

Publishers of The Christian Herald:—Some time ago I sent you $3 for one year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and a copy of the Red Letter Bible. The Bible was received from the express office in good order, and I have received two numbers of the paper. To say I am well pleased with my investment is putting it very mildly. The Butterfly Art Calendar is very fine. I have been looking for a magazine for the last two or three years of the character and make-up of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and never found it until now. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not sectarian, but well adapted to all orthodox denominations, and sheds much light on our Sunday School lessons

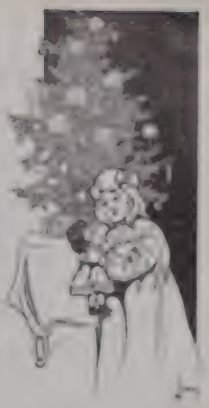
THE CHRISTMAS FIRESIDE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER



SANTA CLAUS' REIGN

I REALLY suppose that nobody in the wide world receives so many letters as Santa Claus. Not to speak of those the children write and drop into the mail, there are thousands on thousands that do not bear Uncle Sam's or any other governmental postmark, that simply go flying to the North Pole, or wherever the dear old saint has his headquarters, by a swift aërial route along which thoughts run far faster than lightning flashes.

If it were not so, if Santa Claus did not hear by love's wonderful telephone and love's amazing telegraph, exactly what the children wanted, how could he ever find out. Not the little golden heads only find the right presents in their stockings, but the silver hair and the gray hair on grandma's and grandpa's head, does not keep them from being like children on Christmas, and taking lots of pleasure in the happy day. Santa Claus loads up that old sleigh of his with gifts for big people as for little, for President Roosevelt as well as for Archie and Quentin, for the Doctor of Divinity as well as for the laddie learning his alphabet; for King Edward over in England, as well as for the youngest prince or princess in the group of grandchildren.

Santa Claus must be a wizard, for he does not make mistakes. I think love is his teacher. Don't you?

Gracious Receiving

Don't you fancy that Santa Claus is now and then a little disappointed that people are not grateful for his gifts? I've seen Mary annoyed because Mabel had a bigger doll than she, and Dick much vexed, because in his stocking there was a shaving-set, when he wanted military brushes. Or, if not just in the stocking, these bigger things were somehow fastened to it. I once heard a lady, who had received a pile of presents, but not one thing she hoped for, ejaculate disdainfully, "Truck!" when she looked at her things. Dear children, if you can help it, never sit in the seat of the scornful. It is always perilously near the way of the ungodly. Do be thankful through and through, with the gladness of a true heart, when you receive nice presents, and accept them with generous and overflowing thanks.

Presents to Santa Claus

It does not seem quite fair, does it, that Santa Claus should have to bless the whole wide world, and nobody bless him? Is there not a way that we can take to pay him in kind for all his goodness? Let us see.

About Thanksgiving time, a young lady looking out her window, observed a poor, forlorn, ragged woman, old and bent, groping in an ash-barrel for something to eat. She hoped there might be a crust, or a bone, that would appease her hunger. It almost broke the tender heart of the watching girl, and she flew out like a bird, hat and coat hurried on as she ran, and overtook the poor sister of hers, for the poor are our brothers and sisters, and carried her off to buy a Thanksgiving dinner. "Put the things in two parcels, please," said the old woman. "Why?" "Because, where I live there is a woman poorer than I, and sick, and I want to divide with her."

When we bestow something at the Christmastide on people as poor and as heavy-hearted as this old grandame, we do give Santa Claus a present. If we send a scrap-book, full of bright pictures pasted on linen, to the hospital for crippled children, we do give Santa Claus a present; for there is Spirit of Good, abroad in the earth and at Christmas time he makes the weakest accept [illegible] as the strong. You know that he sees a great many needs. He must see your dear father and mother, your brothers, your friends. To do his errands, and help him carry good things and good gifts to every corner of the globe. Why, a friend of mine had a glimpse of him once in

Far South Africa

It was Christmas Eve, and she was in a church where Moravian ministers were teaching the Hottentots. A band of dark faces, not low white faces, and oh! such singing to a great organ's chords of memory of losses and hope. For there, as here, in the midnight, angels chanted "Peace on earth, good will to men. Glory to God in the highest." And there, as here, at every Christmas-tide Christ is born again in the hearts of men who worship at his feet.

And the Star rains its fire,
The beautiful star,
In the manger of Bethlehem
Jesus is King.

Last Directions to the Good Saint

No matter what pains we take, at the very last moment there will be something to say or to do. So, the children will pin up their stockings, and mother will hold the baby in her arms, and he and the rest will look up, up, up, to the chimney, and the biggest girl and the biggest boy will come last, and they will call their final instructions to Santa Claus. Not to forget Amy's doll, or Fred's skates, or the book for Elsie, or the comb and brush for Jimmy, or the lace collar for Caroline. Not to forget a single thing! The poor children down the street, who are to have a basket of good things,

LAST WORDS TO SANTA CLAUS

Father

Father is not always well acquainted with the children. He supposes he is, of course. But he does not know how large he seems to their eyes, how all powerful they imagine. It is a pity, but some are very loving fathers and yet children are afraid of them. So many fathers, too, their sons and daughters seem to forget. [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] and

THE CODE OF HAMMURABI

AS the oldest body of laws in existence, the Code of Hammurabi, which was discovered at Susa, Babylonia, last winter, is of the greatest interest to the whole world. Hammurabi was the King of Babylon about 2250 B.C., and was probably a contemporary of Abraham. "The foundation of the Babylonian law," writes Prof. Johnston, of Johns Hopkins University, "was the code of Hammurabi, and thus the enactments of the old Babylonian king, formulated about 2250 B.C., passed, more than a thousand years later, into the Book of the Covenant, and so became the heritage of Israel and the world."

Below are some of the statutes of this great law-making monarch, which, even to modern ears, sound just and equitable:

If a man (in a case) offers (as a bribe) grain or money to the witnesses, he shall himself bear the sentence passed in that case.

If a judge pronounces a judgment, renders a decision, delivers a verdict duly signed and sealed, and afterwards alters his judgment, they shall call that judge to account for the alteration of the judgment which he had pronounced, and he shall pay twelvefold the penalty which was in the said judgment, and, in the assembly, they shall expel him from his seat of judgment, and he shall not return, and with the judges in a case he shall not take his seat.

If the owner (claimant) of the lost property does not produce witnesses to identify his lost property, he has attempted fraud, he has stirred up strife, he shall be put to death.

If the seller has gone to (his) fate, the purchaser shall recover damages in the said case fivefold from the estate of the seller.

If a man steals a man's son (kidnapping), who is a minor, he shall be put to death.

If a man neglects to strengthen his dyke and does not strengthen it, and a break is made in his dyke, and the water carries away the farm land, the man in whose dyke the break has been made shall restore the grain which he has damaged.

If a man cuts down a tree in a man's orchard, without the consent of the owner of the orchard, he shall pay one half mana of silver.

If an artisan takes a son for adoption and teaches him his handicraft, one may not bring claim for him.

If a man strikes another man in a quarrel and wounds him, he shall swear "I struck him without intent," and he shall be responsible for the physician.

If a physician operates on a man for a severe wound with a bronze lancet and causes the man's death, or opens an abscess (in the eye) of a man with a bronze lancet and destroys the man's eye, they shall cut off his fingers.

If a builder builds a house for a man and does not make its construction firm, and the house, which he has built, collapses and causes the death of the owner of the house, that builder shall be put to death.

Churches in the Klondyke

MR. A. E. BALL, of Mountain View, Wash., who has spent three years in Alaska, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

The Klondyke is not a place that is frozen out of the empire of God. There are many churches and schools in the city of Dawson—Methodist, Presbyterian, Church of England, Catholic, and the Salvation Army—and which are a great power for good in reaching the miners. But there are many saloons and snares to entrap the weak, and temptations to decoy the unguarded. These saloons dare not sell spirituous liquors to the Indians. Why dare they sell to whites, so as to make Christians drunkards?

The Indians, three miles from Dawson, are called Moose-hides. They live in a village by that name. They are fast passing away with consumption and other diseases. I called on Chief Isaac, who is quite intelligent. One of the commercial companies gave him a round-trip ticket to San Francisco, and the outside world was a wonder to the Moose-hide chief. I asked him what he thought of his trip? He replied: "Big village, big water, big boat. No moose, no bear; but white man more than Indians." Among them is a missionary named Toty, who is teaching them, and has translated songs into the Indian tongue, which they sing and seem to enjoy very much. The chief says he wants his braves to be like the white man.

The Crown Encyclopedia Had It

I was talking with a friend about a certain plant with which neither of us was very familiar. I at once said, "I'll consult my Crown Encyclopedia," and there, sure enough, I found Ramil sufficiently defined to give us a satisfactory knowledge of the plant about which we were talking. Accept my thanks for your generous treatment.

THE ANTI-PROFANITY LEAGUE

THE historic Park Street Church, of Boston, was, on December 6, the scene of the inauguration of a new reform, when, in a great mass meeting addressed by eminent clergymen, and approved by distinguished men, The Anti-Profanity League was introduced to the American public. Rev. John L. Withrow, D.D., LL.D., pastor of the church and President of the League, presided. Addresses were given by the Rev. Roland D. Sawyer, of Hanson, Mass., founder of the organization, and by Rev. A. H. Plumb, D.D., of Boston, who closed his remarks by offering resolutions which were heartily adopted as the sentiment of the meeting. They recite that:

"A careless and disrespectful use of the name of God ought to be strictly avoided by all right minds, not only as an express violation of the Divine command, but also as a sure indication of a low moral nature, and as a usage destructive to the highest interests of society, in breaking down all respect for true worth. . . . . Profanity should be avoided, not merely because it is no longer tolerated by the usages of refined society, but mainly because it is inherently wicked, a direct personal affront to God, an act which gratifies no bodily appetites, but is of that purely spiritual wickedness which seems allied to the pernicious recklessness of evil spirits. . . . We solemnly engage for ourselves, and will earnestly endeavor to induce others, especially the young, to engage to refrain conscientiously and always from all oaths, except in judicial procedure, and from all profane and irreverent use of the name of God, assured that God will not and ought not to 'hold him guiltless who taketh his name in vain.'"

Several messages of approval were read, including the following from President Roosevelt:

"The future welfare of our nation depends upon the way in which we can combine in our men — in our young men—decency and strength; genuine and sincere effort toward being decent and cleanly in thought, in word, and in deed. I ask you to remember that you cannot retain your self-respect if you are loose and foul of tongue; that a man who is to lead a clean and honorable life must inevitably suffer, if his speech is not clean and honorable.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT."

This League was first introduced to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the issue of February 28, 1902, since which time it has had a rapid growth, and is now established in forty States, two territories, Canada, Scotland, England, Ireland, Switzerland and South Africa, with a membership of 12,000, nearly one hundred auxiliary societies and eight State secretaries. Rev. Roland D. Sawyer, Hanson, Mass., is General Secretary. Any one interested in the movement who will write to him, will receive full particulars free.

Good Things to Learn

LEARN to laugh. A good laugh is better than medicine.

Learn how to tell a story. A well-told story is as welcome as a sunbeam in a sick room.

Learn to keep your own troubles to yourself. The world is too busy to care for your ills and sorrows.

Learn to stop croaking. If you cannot see any good in this world, keep the bad to yourself.

Learn to hide your aches and pains under a pleasant smile.

Learn to attend strictly to your own business—very important point.

Learn to greet your friends with a smile. They carry too many frowns in their own hearts, to be bothered with yours.

The Immoral Dance

Editor of The Christian Herald:—Several months ago you published an article in your paper called, "Warfare on the Dance." It was an interview that several ministers and myself had had with fifty men on the subject. In that article you asked other ministers to express their views in your paper on the subject. You sent me nearly one hundred copies of your paper containing this article, and I have written personal letters to a great number of papers, enclosing the article and asking them to publish it. It has gone into nearly two million homes.

This modern dancing is a great curse. Ninety men out of one hundred whom I have asked the direct question, "Is the modern waltz dangerous to virtue?" have said it was. May the Holy Spirit direct you in all you do. L. D. EWING,

Pastor of Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

TO AID MACEDONIA'S REFUGEES

THE New York Committee, organized by Rev. Messrs. Popoff and Furnajieff, has issued the following appeal:

What Paul saw in the spirit, the man of Macedonia, who called to him for help for his country, we have before us in the flesh. The suffering and destitution, resulting from insurrection in Macedonia, are extreme. Twenty-five thousand Macedonians have managed to cross the border into Bulgaria. Several times that number remain in Macedonia, homeless, their herds and crops destroyed, perishing of cold and starvation. Everyone is familiar to some extent with the conditions which have prevailed in that unhappy country for the last two years and more, the active agitation of the Macedonian revolutionists, the rising in rebellion of a portion of the Macedonian people, the attempt of the Turkish authorities to suppress the revolution with the utmost severity by overwhelming force. With the rights and wrongs of the Macedonians we are not now concerned, but we cannot help being concerned with the relief of fellow human beings and fellow Christians, of innocent women and children, who are perishing by the hundred, and will perish by the thousand, most cruelly, unless Christian Europe and Christian America come to the rescue.

At this Christmas season, with its thought of peace and good-will, of joy and merry-making, tens of thousands of villagers, stripped of everything but the clothes on their backs, are facing the winter cold without food. We appeal to you for contributions to aid the destitute and suffering Macedonians in Bulgaria and Macedonia. For some months, not less, certainly, than $1,000 a day are required to relieve the most pressing wants—clothing, food, fuel. Ten times that sum could be used to advantage. All contributions sent to the Trust Company of America as treasurer, 149 Broadway, or Kidder, Peabody & Co., Boston, will be forwarded without expense. American missionaries in the field will superintend wisely and economically the distribution of all sums thus forwarded for purposes of relief to all sufferers, without regard to race or religion.

Christmas Among the Very Poor*

BY MAUD BALLINGTON BOOTH

CHRISTMAS is a sad season in prison, because it is, perhaps of all days, the one when thoughts most surely circle around home, and when pictures of past happy days shine out in vivid contrast to the lonely, narrow cell, with its bare walls and heavy barred door. But if it is a sad day for the men within the walls, it is equally so for many of the families who have to abandon the thought of any Christmas cheer to brighten their poverty.

Naturally fathers in prison, whose little ones are still intensely dear to them, grieve much over their inability to do anything towards the cheering and gladdening of the children's Christmas. We have for several years now made our Christmas greeting to the families of our "boys," a special feature of our work. We have a big book in which a list of our families is carefully recorded, every child's sex and age, and, as far as possible, size, can be found therein. Besides this, we send to the New York and New Jersey prisons some weeks before the holidays, and ask all men who know that their dear ones are in poverty, to send us the home address, that we may visit them, and in this way compile a very complete list of those who need help. Naturally this has proved a great cheer to the men themselves, and, in many instances, has touched hearts that were hardened against any religious influence.

MRS. MAUD BALLINGTON BOOTH

Our preparations for Christmas have to begin several weeks beforehand. Our idea has never been to prepare a big banquet to which the hungry are bidden for one good meal. Many of our families are out of town or scattered from one end to the other of this long island, and even could we gather them all together, we want our help to be more lasting. The Christmas tree decked for the children is a treat always enjoyed by little ones, but even that sends them back to a very gloomy home that seems all the colder with its fireless stove and empty cupboard, after the glitter and brightness of the festivity. Our plan is to give to each child one good suit of clothing, to provide a supply of groceries, a turkey, and money sufficient for fuel and vegetables. Some needed article of clothing for the mother is added, and then toys and candies for the children. We could hardly send the mothers instructions to hang up the stockings for us to fill, for sometimes the nuts, candy and oranges, would drop through these much-worn articles, and often there would be no stockings to hang up. We therefore buy stockings wholesale, and fill them.

Our Hope Hall wagon goes from home to home the whole day before Christmas. The poverty revealed is pitiful in the extreme, and the gratitude of mothers who receive this Christmas cheer is pathetic in its intensity. To many of the little ones it has been explained that no Santa Claus can come to their home because father is away, so the surprise is all the greater. One family we heard of through the letter of the eldest child, a ten-year-old boy, in which he told us that their "Santa Claus was dead." He had a baby brother thirteen months old, another aged six years and three little sisters. The child added, "Mother goes out working, but she can't get us anything." You can imagine the joy that the Christmas gifts caused.

Late one Christmas eve, when the work of distribution was nearly over, the officer who had charge of that duty for the upper part of the city, climbed up the many gloomy stairs of a great tenement and knocked at the rear door. All was dark and quiet, but when the knock was repeated, she heard a child-voice answer, "Wait a minute, please." In a few moments the door was opened, and in the light stood a lovely child. She was about six years old, and clad in her little white night-dress, with the halo effect of her golden curls, she looked like an angel. The child seemed surprised to see a visitor, but with much natural courtesy, she asked her in, placed a chair for her, and then with an "excuse me, please," she flitted into the inner room to slip on her dress and shoes, explaining also that she must "see to the children." The bedroom revealed two other little ones—a boy of about four and a baby of some sixteen months, whom the little girl tucked in again very tenderly after dressing her brother, with the instruction, "You must keep covered up, baby." Then she returned to talk to the visitor. Mother it seemed, was out, trying to collect some money which was owing her for work. Did she know about Santa Claus? Oh! yes, she knew all about him, only mother said he could not call at their house this year. A look around, however, showed that he was much needed. There was neither food nor fuel in the house, but it was scrupulously clean, and the children's clothing, which was very threadbare and much patched, showed that the mother's loving fingers had done all that could be done to keep them neat and clean. Waxing confidential on the subject of Santa Claus, the little girl added, "Johnny and I have been listening, and we thought we heard him whistling down the chimney. Didn't we, Johnny?" Johnny, round-eyed and wide-awake by now, assented, and then the interest of both children was riveted on the visitor by her startling announcement that Santa Claus' wagon was down below in the street. On being asked if she would like a doll, if such a treasure could be found in the wonderful wagon, her little face lighted up with joy, and she cried impetuously, "Oh, yes!" But immediately checking herself, she added, "No, thank you, ma'am, I think I am too old; but baby would like it, I am sure." Poor tiny mother, with the care of the children on her shoulders, she had already learned to sacrifice, and to realize how short a childhood is the lot of the children of the poor. It was a happy Christmas after all, and the father in his prison cell, heard the echo of it afterwards.

On the upper East Side, we gave a little girl not only a doll, but a beautiful little trunk full of clothes that had been sent with it. Her brother of ten, received a sled, and they both got new clothes. These two children simply went mad with joy. Running into a back room, they stood and screamed aloud to vent their feelings, and the good woman, a hard worker, said with tears in her eyes, "My man will be home this time next year." For five years she had fought the wolf alone. This woman walked the streets of New York (being evicted the very day her husband was sentenced), all night long, with her two little children clinging to her skirts. Finally, she procured a room—a washtub and an old stove, and she and her little ones lay upon the bare floor every night for six weeks, with nothing to cover them but the mother's skirts.

We turn into a side street and stop at a house—one of the kind Dickens liked to describe. No one lived on the ground floor—at least all was dark, and the front door without a lock banged upon its hinges. Rails upon the staircase were partly gone and the cold wind rushed through the hall. At the top of the stairs is a smoky oil lamp with broken chimney. We knock at the first door to the left, and a young girl timidly opens it. Two little children, five and seven, respectively, peer out suspiciously from behind their sister, who is in this case mother of the house. She is eighteen years old, and when we explain our mission, the door swings wide open, for food, coal and clothing mean a happy Christmas. The little ones set up an impromptu dance, and the girl stepping back, shades her eyes with her hands. She is crying, but it is because she is glad. Each of the little ones has a doll by now, and one has crept off to the corner and is talking to hers in mysterious doll language. They do not worry any more about the visitor, because they are absorbed in their treasure. Finally, we get them interested in sundry little dresses, that the man from the wagon below is bringing, with a turkey and other good things, until the little mother of the house hardly knows what to say, but she says as we hand her a good sized bill, "Oh! thank you, sir." I can never tell you all that the "thank you, sir!" expressed. So, with a merry Christmas, we left them all overwhelmed with joy.

Jane Maria

A Christmas Story by MARY LOWE DICKINSON

"TO SEE HER LOVEY JANE MARIA, ABLAZIN' ON THE KITCHEN FIRE"

I

IF ye plaze, Masther Frid, here's BobWathers; besachin' the loan iv yer slid,
And the shovel yez got for yer Christmas, the b'y has a feyther that's deid,
And he's askin' the loan iv the shovel to make joost a bit iv a thrack,
For his mother to hang up the washin'. Rale soon he'll be bringin' it back."

"No, I won't, Biddy Flynn! What a question! My shovel, and my pretty sled!"

"Now be aisy, and whist, Masther Freddy! Ye know his poor feyther, he's dead,
And the mither, she's thryin' the washin' to kape the roof over his head,
And the weather's so frosty and frazin'! Sure, Friddy, ye'll lind him the loan."

"No, he can't have the sled or the shovel! They're mine, and they're just for my own!
And the shovel is most broke already. I chucked it against a big stone,
And as soon as it ever stops snowing I'm going to build, in the snow,
A house for my sled—just a purpose—so 'course I don't want it to go!"

"How is this?" asked the gentle-voiced mother, a-pause at the open door.
"Why, mamma, that boy, Bobby Waters, the lean one that came here before,
One cold day, to shovel the crossings, he wants now to borrow my sled,
'Cause his basket of clothes is too heavy. And just 'cause his father is dead,
Biddy thinks that I might let him take it. That old straw basket will scratch,
And, if only I once got the paint off, it couldn't be painted to match!
And you see, mamma, I'm only waiting, until it don't snow, for a slide."

But his mother came quietly nearer and sighed, or Fred fancied she sighed,
Though the smile on her face was o'ershadowed, not one word of chiding she said,
And her hand, dropping softly upon him, caressed the bright curls on his head;
But he fidgeted, wriggled and twisted; full well could the lad understand,
That he might be far from his mother, while feeling the touch of her hand,
And a faint rosy color flushed swiftly his forehead, and crimsoned his cheek.
Still the boy only twisted and wriggled, and felt unaccountably meek,
And thought, "If she only would scold me; I really don't think I should mind,
But I feel, in this terwible stillness, like a boy of the vewy worst kind;
But the very worst kind and the meanest would surely go sneaking away—
I'm not mean—but it seems to stop snowing. It's high time I went out to play."

II.

Now, that night as he lay in his chamber, adjoining his mother's room,
Through the open door he could see her moving about in the gloom,
There had fallen a cloud on the twilight, the shade of an unspoken blame,
Though supper and games and music had greeted him all the same.
But now he wanted his mother; and seeing her silently creep
Over the threshold, he called her, "Dear mother, I am not asleep;
Come in, please, and sit here beside me, close on the edge of the bed,
And tell me a dear little story of something you've heard or read,
Or that happened when you were little." "I heard one this morning," she said.
"You did? Was it true and real jolly?" "Not jolly; it made the tears start,
But 'twas true, and I wanted to gather the dear little girl to my heart."

"Oh, all 'bout a girl! Those girl stories! Of course I don't know 'bout this one,
But little girl stories in gen'ral are not—not the best kind of fun.
Does it open with 'once 'pon a time,' Ma?"

"No, a very few days ago.
Along the great North River the hills were white with snow,
The trees all bore snow blossoms, the streams had ceased to run,
And the ice was quite unyielding to the kisses of the sun.
For roofs and stacks and chimneys the snow had wreathed a crown,
The white drifts hid the fences, the roads from town to town
Were buried by the same wild storm that blew the sign-posts down.
Upon the mountain's slope there stood a house both old and gray,
Whose walls had oft rung merrily with sounds of work and play.
Here dwelt a little maiden, her parents' pride and joy,
They loved her, I've no doubt, as much—well, as I love my boy;
And the cottage home was happy, and the winter fire burned bright,
When to the waiting world there came, once more, the Christmas night.
This child was not forgotten, though living far away
From cities where, with feasts and gifts, they keep the holiday.
She had her little presents, too; not many, but quite 'nice;'
Among them was a tiny sled, for, in that land of ice,
No one, not even Santa Claus, with all his quirks and quirls
Had ever held the notion that 'sleds were not for girls.'
She had a shovel, too, I think——" "Now mother!" broke in Fred,
"You're makin' b'lieve?" "Nay, I tell you just what I heard and read.
Of course, she had a rag doll, quite likely more than one,
For rag, of all the dollies, is the nicest kind of fun.
And the dollies had a cradle—her father made her that—

And a little bed and bedstead, where slept her Tabby cat;
And—let me see, there was, of course, a tiny rocking chair,
Wherein she hushed her doll to sleep with tender mother care."
"And was she pretty?" "She was good, as you will quickly see
When you have heard the story through, as it was told to me."

III.

"The snow was at its deepest upon the Kingston hill,
And the little maiden's father lay within the cottage, ill.
The fierce and hungry fever, burning the whole night through,
At last assailed the mother, and she was stricken, too.

Jane Maria

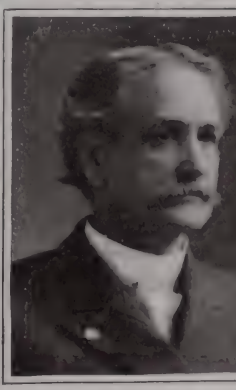
The dear child watched through worn eyes and through the lonely night,
The great earth lay in silence beneath a mirror of white,
No sound in all the forest save the wind in straining trees,
No footstep on the threshold, no voice upon the breeze.
Still in the wind the snowy drifts kept piling higher and higher,
While on the hearth there flickered in a dull expiring fire.
In vain, with trembling fingers, the dying brand she trimmed;
In vain, she sought another stick—this one last was burned.
She nursed it with her own sweet breath, she coaxed with all her skill,
She laid her shawl across the bed, then, shivering, cried.
She wanted to her dear ones slept, and, kneeling by the bed,
She whispered her own prayers to God—I don't know what she said.
But suddenly, across the gloom, there seemed to flash a spark
She thought of all the pleasant times before last one set in night.
And up she started, with a heart, and dashed across the floor.
'Why didn't something pop into my head before?
A pretty mother I have been, forgetting Jane Maria!
Where is she now? Come out, dear doll! Yes, make a splendid fire.
Then, with a sudden troubled laugh, the chilly room rang,
It sounded like a sob, but the [illegible] would not heed a pang
To see her special pet rag doll, with raffled pantaloons and a
Her lovey, dovey Jane Maria—a blazing on the kitchen fire.
The little maiden stopped her ears, but really never screeched."
"Braver than city dollies," said Fred, "can't squeeze cream, but they'll speak."
"There was no time to mourn for her, too soon that deed was done.
While the fire to warm the cottage was scarcely well begun,
So one, and then another—'twas hardest to begin—
She brought her picture-books and toys and bravely thrust them in.
The little broom, the cradle, the bed for Tabby cat,
The chair where Jane Maria was to kel—'twas hard to part with that—
And the handle of the shovel, and, last, the pasteboard
On which her name was painted in letters round and red.
When all was gone, she stood and gazed upon the cruel fire,
And grieved—because she had not kissed her martyred Jane Maria.
Had youth departed with her toys? So lone she felt, and old;
Her parents were her babies now, and they must not be cold.
So she watched and prayed till morning—she had done all she could,
And He who loves the children heard, for, striding through the wood,
There came a stalwart neighbor, at early dawn of day,
Who helped and cheered the maiden, and hastened on his way
To tell them in the valley, that, where the storm was wild,
High up on Kingston Mountain, waited and watched a child.
But ere the day touched sunset they made their way to her door,
With food and fuel and healing. The lonely watch was o'er;
But I doubt if her sled and her dolly ever came back any more."
"I will give her mine," said Freddy, snug in his mother's breast,
"I've got more toys than a hundred! I'd like to give her the best!"
And Fred lay back on his pillow with never a further word.
But, passing by Bridget's kitchen next morning, his mother heard:
"If Bobby comes round here, hereafter, 'twill be the awfulest sin
If you don't just stuff him with goodies; and, listen to me, Biddy Flynn,
If ever I catch you refusin' to lend him my shovel again,
I shall call you a hard-hearted heathen, and it would be true, Biddy Flynn."
"Away wid yez, now, wid yer jokin'; 'twas yezself would'n lind him the sled.
More shame till ye, thin! the poor craythur, and he wid a frayther that's dead."
"No, no! Biddy Flynn, I'm no haythen! I'll give him my sled out and out,
And when he goes home with the basket I'll help him to haul it about.
I've been in his yard all the morning, a-digging away, just for fun;
When he walked in the gate with the bundles—I bet you I out and run.
But the paths for the clothes are all ready—now, Biddy, just give me a bun."
"Dade I will. Bless the b'y! He's me darlint! the pride of me sowl, sure he now."
"And of mine," said his mother, imprinting her good morning kiss on his brow.

A Little Flower of Memory

BY MARGARET BOTTOME

COL. H. H. HADLEY—In Heaven! I received a letter a few days ago in which he said, "I have hopes yet of getting up, as the Lord knows how to make me well." Yes, he was right, the Lord did know how, and he has gone "up" and is "well."



THE LATE COL. H. H. HADLEY

How many of us in memories can hear him sing on the platform, with the drunkards before him, "Life immortal I receive, Oh the wondrous story. I was lost but now I'm found. Glory! Glory! Glory!"

I knew Colonel Hadley. He was a grand man—a soldier every inch of him—and he became "a Soldier of the Cross, a follower of the Lamb," and he did not go to heaven "On flowery beds of ease." In one way and another it was a fight, a struggle, a battle and victory, until in Boulder, Colo., he laid his armor down. I believe the battle is over, that I do not like to think about, as I long to whom it came to him that he must die. Writing the Camp" He felt the extension. He was so full of love, so full of good cheer, that to be shut out from human fellowship was the hardest thing for the soldier's spirit, and so like him it was to set his brain to work to see if he could not do something to make it easier for those who might have to follow him on the hard road. They must not suffer as he had; they must not be broken in heart. It was self-sacrifice with him to the last.

I asked him once if he could tell me the happiest moment in his life, after he became a Christian. I knew he loved the Bible and the loved secret prayer, but when he was asked for the most blissful moment he had ever known, he said it was in Boundary, where he put his arm around a poor drunken fellow, a filthy object, but the Colonel said, "I put my arm around him and there we parted him and Christ appeared to me. Not with outward eyes did I see Him, but I knew His smile, and the words were spoken: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least, ye have done it unto me.'"

We are to have the burning desire to save souls. I am congratulating him now, while trying to keep back the tears. Earth seems to be poorer, maybe not. We shall see clearly. We are not spectral enough. But one thing we can know, and that I [illegible] Hadley know—he had immortal life. Until I see him again I shall never lose the memory of "Life immortal I receive." He and I for the years, from the time in the old Water Street Mission, when he fell at the feet of Christ among the other poor drunkards and outcasts denied to Jesus Christ. He said then at that moment of deep surrender he never dreamed that the apostate would be taken from him. From that moment he never had the slightest desire for it.

Death never touched his spirit. He knew the life of Faith. Hope and Love.

Dear Lord, how could we know but they Still walk unseen with us and love?
Near sleeps the weary mother's babe
He smiled. Above me

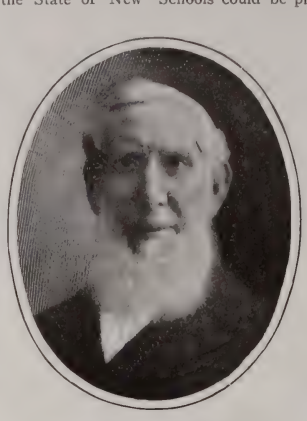
A Sunday School Veteran Dead

MANY are the hearts and homes to which the news of the death of Mr. Russell W. McKee will bring sadness and a sense of personal loss. He had devoted himself so thoroughly to the Master's work, and had been helpful to so many young people, not only in Brooklyn and throughout the State of New York, but in distant cities, that his death leaves the world poorer for a host of friends. It occurred on Dec. 8, after a long and painful illness.

Mr. McKee had attained the ripe age of seventy-seven years, but no man had succeeded more conspicuously than he in retaining that mental energy and youthful freshness of spirit which characterizes those whose chief delight it is to minister to young people, and train the rising generation in the knowledge of Christ. His Bible Class in the Throop Avenue Presbyterian Church, of Brooklyn, established nearly thirty years ago, is a concrete testimony to the power and charm of his teaching, which continued to the last.

In his office, as President of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union, Mr. McKee had many important duties to perform, which were always carefully considered and faithfully executed. Nor did these exhaust the energies of this wonderful man, who, at nearly eighty years of age, was still prompt and vigorous in any service by which the interests of the Sunday Schools could be promoted. As Financial Secretary of the New York Sunday School Union, he was successful in raising large sums for the work, and was always himself a liberal giver. His devotion, enthusiasm, and genial manner endeared him to all with whom he was associated, and won for him the warmest affection. Especially by the members of his Bible Class was he appreciated. Though it contained so many men of various ages and social positions, there was not one whom he did not intimately know, and never did sorrow or trial visit their homes without his being there to console and encourage. Well did he fulfil the apostolic injunction, "Bear ye one another's burdens." By his death multitudes of souls are bereaved.



THE LATE RUSSELL W. MCKEE

The Secret of Obedience

How Jesus Conquered

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

HOW many Sunday School teachers, as well as parents, have told their children how the Lord Jesus was once a child, just the age which they are, and how perfectly he always obeyed his parents; and as he is their example, how they ought also always to obey! But many a child who has sincerely desired to obey, has found in the moment of temptation how much stronger has been the force within which yielded to the temptation than the power to resist it. They might have said with Paul, "To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not" (Rom. 7: 18). And many a reflective child has reasoned inwardly: "If Jesus was God as well as man, of course he had the advantage of me. It was quite easy for him to obey; he was not born with a perverse will, such as I have; it came natural to him to obey, as natural as it is for me to disobey; so it is not fair to expect me to be like him." And in the heart of the child there is something like a sense of injustice.

But is the child in the right? And are the teachers in the right who require obedience without showing how to obey? Probably both are in the wrong, from lack of understanding what the Scriptures tell us of the earthly life, and especially of the boyhood of our Lord. Our Lord Jesus was indeed obedient, so that he could say, "I do always those things which please him" (the Father). But how? "He that sent me is with me; the Father hath not left me alone" (John 8: 29). Had he been left alone, it might have been as difficult for him to obey as for any other child; for we read: "He learned obedience (Heb. 5: 8). He was always God as well as man while he was upon earth, but he emptied himself (Phil. 2: 7) of his Godhead, as far as that Godhead would have made him independent of constant reliance upon his Father; and he brought himself down to our level, so that he needed the Father to be always with him that he might please him.

He did not obey just naturally and without any trouble for he was "tempted in all points like as we are" (Heb. 4: 5), and these must have been real conflicts, for he "suffered being tempted" (Heb. 2: 18); and he was continually in prayer for strength from above. He said: "I can of mine own self do nothing; as I hear, I judge: and my judgment is just; because I do not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me;" and again, "The Son can do nothing of himself" (John 5: 30, 19). Thus we see he had a will, as a human being, which could have been yielded to. But in answer to his prayer, power came from his Father to resist his own will, and to obey his Father. Again and again we see he had a will of his own. "I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me" (John 6: 38). "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt" (Matt. 26: 39). Yet invariably he renounced his will to do that of his father.

But how was his Father's will made known to him? He took pains to ascertain it. Always in the morning he was waiting upon God in prayer, and he tells us in the prophecy of Isaiah (50: 4, 5, R. V.): "The Lord hath given me the tongue of them that are taught that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary. He wakeneth morning by morning. He wakeneth mine ear to hear as they that are taught. The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious." Thus we learn how it was his habit to start the day with prayer and listening to his Father to be taught his will. And he was a close student of Scripture, and as man, he knew his life's vocation from Scripture.

It is just by his obedience at a cost, even obedience unto death, that he has not only taken our place and borne our sins as really as though we ourselves had died upon the cross; but he has also procured for us the power to obey as he obeyed. Whatever he in our nature has accomplished, he has made a way for us to accomplish as he did, by the power of God dwelling in us. He conquered Satan's temptations all through a life of thirty-three years, and proved that they can be overcome.

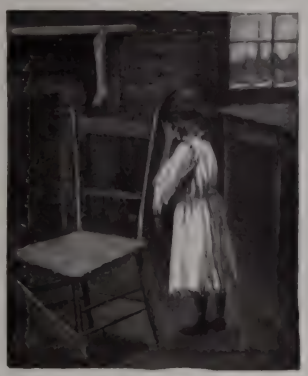
SUNSHINE AND GOOD CHEER

WHERE TO SEND THEM AT THE BLESSED CHRISTMAS TIME

NOT long ago the president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Branch asked the members to give Mrs. Romaine Scott, of 1114 Twelfth street, N. E., Washington, D. C., a birthday party by letter. Just to show how prompt our readers are, a part of Mrs. Scott's letter is quoted.

My birthday was a wonderful surprise. Do you know that I received over two hundred letters—all from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshiners. One dear old lady sent me a dollar for stamps, but I never could get enough stamps together to reply to the two hundred letters, so will you please put a short letter of thanks into THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Corner. Tell the kind people they gave the old soldier and his invalid wife a great deal of pleasure in writing such good letters. We thank them for all their kind wishes, and for all tokens sent.



FORGOTTEN BY SANTA CLAUS

Alas! for the young eyes that weep on Christmas morn;
Alas! for the young hearts that never know a joy.
Over the cold hearth the stocking droops forlorn,
Ungifted by Santa with lollipop or toy.

Our readers, besides responding to the call of Mrs. Scott, sent $7.60 for the relief of other Shut-ins.

It may be of interest to many Sunshiners to know that "Clovernook," the old home of the Cary sisters, has been purchased by William A. Proctor for $10,000, and given to the Misses Trader for a Home for the Blind. Miss Georgia Trader is totally blind. A few years ago, she began teaching the blind from her own books, people who had heard of this sent her books, and now she has a library of over 900 volumes. Miss Alice Cary was the first President of Sotosis, the oldest Woman's Club in New York State.

Who wants to help to fill the empty stockings? The Branch presidents learn of so many little folks who seem to have nobody to look after them—nobody to think of them at Christmas time. These Branch presidents confer with the President-General at headquarters, 96 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and they try to surprise just as many little folks as they have stamps to carry the greeting. First on the list is a little one-armed girl who lives in Harlem. There is a little boy on the books who has no arms. Then there seems to be hundreds in wheel-chairs. One little newspaper boy, a Sunshiner, has no legs below his knees. Here is a blind boy, and here is a little girl with a twisted foot. Who will remember them?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BRANCH now numbers over a thousand members. Each one ought to prove his or her thankfulness in some way at this gracious Christmas season.

GROWTH IN THE CHURCH*

Mutual Service and Helpfulness Expected of the Members

GROWTH and development were evidently expected by the Apostle in every member of the church at Ephesus. In these days, there is in many minds a tendency to rest satisfied with conversion. The new convert feels that he is saved, that he is a member of a church, and is under new obligations for a clean moral life, but has no definite idea of future progress. Paul's conception of conversion is as a beginning. The goal is "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ." No ideal could be higher than that. He desires his converts to increase in knowledge and to grow to perfection. They are, in his view, children whose education and training are to go on, as in a school, becoming stronger in principle, more firmly established in faith and more fervent in love. Thus religion is not to be a dead, lifeless thing, comprised in rites and ceremonies and observances, but a vital force transforming the whole man into Christ's likeness. Character and conduct are both to be affected. The Christian is to be a man like Christ in his disposition and nature, and he is to live Christ's life of helpfulness and beneficence.

The result for which Paul hopes, is evidently not to come wholly, or even principally, from the pastor of the church. The whole church is to work together for mutual advancement. The figure he uses, of the human body, shows that every member has a part to perform. Christ is the head, but there is some service that "every joint supplies." None can be spared. Each has his function, and the perfecting of the whole body depends on that function being executed. Each, while developing, must contribute to the development of the whole.

What a joy a pastor's life would be, if he had a church of this kind! Does he know of some member whose zeal is growing cold? There is some other member who will seek his society and arouse him. Is there one in circumstances of trial or temptation? There is one who has ready tact to advise him. Is there one reluctant to aid in financial efforts? There is another genial and liberal, who will quicken the sluggish liberality. Not masters, not declaimers, not critics does the church need, so much as brethren loving one another and intensely concerned for the welfare of the church collectively and individually. What power the church would have in the world if its members were all of that kind, seeking for themselves and one another Christ-likeness!

These Beautiful Instruments are the result of many years' experience in the manufacture of organs, and are confidently offered to the public. These musical wonders use no paper, but music is obtained from a roller furnished with pins. These pins operate upon valve keys, made of hard steel. All the working parts of the instrument are easily accessible, and are made of solid metal, the rollers and keys being mounted on metal castings. Nothing has been omitted to give these grand instruments their crowning qualities of extreme simplicity and durability. There is no limit to either kind or quality of music. They will play Hymns and Popular Airs, with a clearness and accuracy, and degree of execution which but few performers can equal. A mere child can play them. They have the carrying quality of a Large Pipe Organ, and are the only instruments that will render slow and sacred music with a powerful, sustaining organ tone. They will play tunes as long as desired, without any break, instead of stopping to change the piece, as must be done with organettes. They are beautifully finished in solid walnut. The reeds are organ size, and the volume of tone will fill a hall. They are Genuine Musical Instruments, which anyone can play, without teacher or practice, and which good musicians can recommend. The price is nothing compared with their intrinsic value. They are equal in every way to a $50 Music Box, so far as the quality of the music is concerned, and also in point of construction, finish, and decoration. This organ is the most simple, perfect, marvelous, instructive, enjoyable, and amusing musical instrument in the world. FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS, it is just what is wanted. It will play all the sacred music, and as many verses as desired, without stopping to replace the music roller. This great advantage no other instrument has. By this means, a result is attained that was never reached before.

(President McKinley's last words)

The Concert Roller Organ has a fuller volume of tone, and far more sustaining power than any two pianos. At the same time it is so fully under control, by means of a swell attachment, that the softest passages can be rendered with exquisite delicacy. For evening entertainments, etc., it is most admirable, and when otherwise musicians would have to be engaged, it will save its cost in one night; and is, upon the whole, the most perfect mechanical instrument in design, operation and effect, that has yet been produced.

The case is strongly made of solid black walnut, and is elegantly finished, forming a handsome parlor ornament.

By means of new and automatic machinery, the manufacturers are enabled to produce music rollers in large numbers so that we can offer them to the public at a price not exceeding the average cost of music paper; and a roller will give a very much better performance, besides Outlasting a Thousand Paper Sheets.

There are now ready over Eight Hundred sacred and popular tunes which have been arranged for the Roller Organs. Complete List will be mailed on application.

REMEMBER, ONLY

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

C. W., Bordentown, N. J. 1. If we get to heaven will we see God? I heard a sermon which said we would see Jesus, but not God. I think we shall see God and be like him. 2. "He created man in his own image." What does it mean? 3. What became of Jephthah's daughter? 4. I Cor. 10: 27, what does it mean?

1. There are several passages in the Bible, which clearly state that we shall see God. See Luke 1: 19; Rev. 5: 8, 11; Jude 24; Matt. 5: 8; Isaiah 33: 17; Job 19: 26, 27; I. John 3: 2, and others. 2. He endowed him with a spiritual nature in harmony with His own. 3. The Bible implies that she was literally sacrificed, in accordance with her father's vow. Josephus, the Jewish historian (in Antiquities of the Jews, Book V., chap. 8) says, "he sacrificed his daughter as a burnt-offering." Some commentators, however, hold that she was offered to the Lord by being withdrawn permanently from the world and placed in a religious retreat, like a nunnery. 4. Certainly not. The advice had relation to meats alone.

Apropos of long-married couples, Mr. Chas. C. Ewan, Newfield, N. J., writes:

My father, John G. Ewan, was born May 15, 1816, my mother, September 8, 1822. They were married January 26, 1839, and are the longest married couple in this vicinity. My father has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal church for over seventy years.

Surely this is a record hard to beat.

J. G., Newell Run, O. How many sons had David by his lawful wives, and how many otherwise?

See I. Chronicles, 3, for a list of David's sons.

Dear Sir:—I am to-day in receipt of the Crown Encyclopedia, and wish to thank you heartily for it, at the same time marveling that you can put out such a splendid set of books at such a low figure. I cannot help but compare this set with other sets of books I have, inferior to it, and all in each set by one author, while the Encyclopedia is drawn from many authors and sources.

Pontiac, Mich. R. HARRISON.

J. A. C. A., New Britain, Conn. Is it right to stay at home on Sundays and wait until one's debts are paid before going back to church?

We do not see any logical connection between the two. If the person be a believer, he should go to church and ask God to help him out of his difficulties. To stay away is to make bad worse.

Mrs. J. A. S., Hagerstown, Md. Is there any rule for estimating the number of people in a crowd? If so, please tell me what it is. We often hear people say, "2,000 or 3,000 or 4,000 people attended." How do they get at it when there are no figures?

There is no rule, if the crowd be outdoors. If indoors, the capacity of the building can easily be ascertained. Estimates of outdoor gatherings are apt to be far from reliable. Experienced military men can estimate the number of troops on the march by timing them, as they march past in files. We suppose some few persons have greater experience in estimating crowds than others have, but it is usually guesswork, leaving a large margin for deduction.

Subscriber, Victor, Calif. The Durant murder mystery, as far as we know, has never been solved satisfactorily. The evidence against Durant, while strong, was circumstantial. We have heard of no confession indicating some one else as the criminal.

I. M. O., Casey, Ill. 1. On what syllable do you put the accent for the word "acclimated?" 2. Would you recommend a resident training school, or a school that teaches through the mail, for one to become a professional nurse.

1. The accent is on the third syllable. 2. Actual personal attendance at a practical training school, by all means.

Mrs. L. G. H., Shingle House, Pa. Ought a Christian to wear any gold or very expensive jewels? What are the New Testament teachings on the subject?

See I. Peter, 3rd chapter; I. Tim. 2: 9, 10; I. Cor. 3: 12; I. John 5: 21, and Revelations 18: 12-17.

B, M., Nashville, Tenn. If the Colombian army should really attempt the invasion of the Isthmus, how are we to prevent it, seeing that we have no land forces there, and that the principal military operations would take place far from the coast?

We have by this time, no doubt, both land and naval forces at the Isthmus. Gen. Elliott and several battalions of marines were sent there recently. A considerable force of marines had already been landed. From present indications there will be available between 1,500 and 2,000 United States troops for land service. It is improbable, however, that they will be needed.

J. J., Alameda, Calif. 1. How long have the Turks held Macedonia? 2. Why do not the European Powers intervene to stop the horrible treatment of the Macedonian Christians by the Turks?

1. It was conquered by Amurath II. in 1430 A.D., and has ever since been held under Turkish rule. 2. The Congress of Berlin, in 1878, pledged the leading Powers to secure proper government and just treatment for Turkey's Christian provinces. How that pledge has been neglected the whole world knows. It is primarily due to this neglect—which lies at the door of Britain, France, Germany, Italy and Austria—that the condition of the Christians of Turkey is what it is to-day.

Anxious Ones. No remarriage is necessary. They are already married. Let them lead a helpful Christian life, and by a good example show the sincerity of their Christian profession.

Ellen McD., Rahway, N.Y. 1. What are the annual birth and death rates of the globe? 2. Which disease in our own country has the largest number of victims annually?

There are no means of knowing accurately, as the census is not universal. One writer on the subject says: "Sixty-four persons die every minute, and 30,000,000 are born every year. 2. Pneumonia, which in 1900 had 55,296 deaths, about 400 more than those from consumption.

Reader, Milford, Pa. In last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD I read a timely suggestion for the churches to act upon at Christmas. Would it not be a bright idea to distribute gifts to poor people in the churches at that season?

Many of them do. We know of one which, this year, had a Christmas tree bearing a great variety of good, substantial things for the poor, besides toys and sweets for the children. Many churches send out well-packed and nicely filled Christmas barrels and boxes.

C. H. We have in our rural community those professing Christianity leaders and teachers in Church and Sunday School, who, while spending lavishly upon themselves and children at festive times, plead poverty when money is needed to carry on the work of the Gospel, etc. The children, naturally, grow up selfish. When the case of a sick child urgently needing amusement, and succor, was brought to their notice, not a toy or a dime was forthcoming in response.

You have described a very sad case, yet, unfortunately, one that is very common. People whose hearts have not been touched by divine love, live unto themselves, instead of living to help others and to diffuse blessing and happiness around them. Nothing but God's grace will move hearts that are so steeped in selfishness and indifference.

ALTAR OF THE STANFORD MEMORIAL CHURCH, PALO ALTO, CALIF.

Architects and artists pronounce the Stanford Memorial Church, at Palo Alto, Calif. (erected in connection with the Stanford University), the most ornamental sacred edifice in this country, if not in the world. Four years were spent in its erection. The auditorium ceiling is of the finest Moorish tiling, and the wall paintings are superb. On the upper wall are represented the prophets and judges in mosaics heroic size, and below this is a great panel, showing the angels rejoicing at Christ's victory over sin. Mounted on pedestals along the wall are statues of the twelve apostles. The altar, of Carrara marble, has a beautiful bas-relief of "The Entombment," and behind it is a mural painting of "The Last Supper." Surrounding the altar are statues of "The Holy Family," reproductions of Thorwaldsen's famous originals. All these are the work of famous artists, and so also are the large stained glass windows, of which there are nineteen in the church. The entire cost of this remarkable church was about $600,000, the chancel and its accompaniments alone costing half the amount.

Mr. W. O. McDowell, of New York, is conducting a movement with the object of securing legislative action for international postage at domestic rates, between Great Britain and her colonies and the United States. The movement has already received the support of a considerable portion of the press, and seems likely to grow.

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I received the Butterfly Calendar and premium book, How I Worked My Way Around the World, and I thank you ever so much for them. I think they are grand, and well worth the $2 even without the paper. So does every one who has seen them. I do not know how I could get along without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is so full of good reading. The stories, sermons and other matter are fine.

Reader, North Carolina. Although nothing has ever been said to you about refunding the money, you should repay it by all means now that you are able. You might even add a little to it, in order that your gratitude might enable them to help others, as they helped you.

Ernest S., E. Downington, Pa. To say that any telegraphic system would drive all others from the field would be a purely speculative statement. The present systems are well intrenched and serviceable. Any new method, to wholly displace the old in the commercial world, must first convince the public, as well as the experts, that it possesses superior advantages.

Mrs. O. J. S., Arlington, Ia. Flammarion is regarded as a "speculative" scientist, whose highly developed ideality or vivid imagination has led him to strange conclusions. 2. Don't know him. 3. The Society of Psychical Research is a speculative, not a scientific body. Its investigations into the region of spirits and the phenomena of dreams have been very interesting, but have added little of value to the stock of human wisdom.

Eleanor M., Utica, N. Y. 1. We trust your organization may meet with much encouragement in its efforts for the promotion of temperance. 2. Here are some figures, recently given by George Darsie, which will interest your workers: "The nation's drink bill, $1,000,000,000; tobacco bill, $600,000,000; candy bill, $75,000,000; chewing gum bill, $25,000,000. Its bill for world-wide missions is only $5,000,000." We do not vouch for the figures, as we have seen different estimates.

Mrs. F. K., Newark, N. Y. "The pages of the book enclosed by you is a move in the same direction as Earl's Housekeeping, but lacks three important essentials—Lucid, explanatory material, a plan of simple comparisons of income, and expenditure to enable the housekeeper to curb extravagant outlay; and last, but not least, a small charge for the book itself. Earl's Housekeeping, possessing all the foregoing essentials, costs but 25 cents. The demand for these domestic account books is on the increase, and the simplest yet most comprehensive we know, is Earl's Housekeeping.

A. C. H., Charleston, Ills. 1. Man is left free to choose in the matter of food, certain things only being prohibited as unclean and unfit for human use. There are many who eat flesh who would never kill an animal. 2. We thank God for our food, because he is the universal provider. If he did not give us the ability or the opportunity to earn it, we would soon know the difference. 3. Allowed or permitted Pharaoh's heart to be hardened is the better reading, and conveys the sense more clearly. 4 and 5. It is easy to ask such questions, and the only answer is that the human mind is incapable of grasping or comprehending many things, which must, therefore, remain unexplained. There is neither wisdom nor profit in guessing at solutions that are clearly unsolvable.

A Marvelous Book of Travels

I have finished reading How I Worked My Way Around the World, and liked it very much. It seems almost marvelous for one so young to have accomplished so much. Mr. Morrison has not yet finished his travels unless he has been "'way down South in the land of cotton." MRS. R. K. STEPHENS.

LAMAS PREPARED FOR A CEREMONIAL TIBETAN CAVALRYMEN, INTREPID RIDERS, WHO GUARD THE FRONTIER TIBETAN [illegible]

The British Expedition to Tibet

To Open Up the "Sealed Land"

And What it May Accomplish . . .

AFTER many centuries of seclusion, such as no other country in the world has enjoyed, Tibet, the "Sealed Land" of Central Asia, the mysterious country of the Grand Lama, seems destined to be opened to relations with the rest of the human race. For nearly two hundred years, the "Holy City" of Lhassa, the capital of the country, and the seat of the Dalai Lama, has been the objective point of courageous travelers and explorers. A few have succeeded in penetrating the interior, after perilous journeys across frozen mountain ranges and amid inhospitable Tibetan bands, but the majority have utterly failed. Some lost their lives in the dangerous enterprise, others were subjected to terrible tortures and expelled, with dire warnings not to return.

From time to time, reports of projects for the exploration of Tibet have obtained currency, but none thus far have succeeded in penetrating any considerable distance to the interior. Russian, British and other enterprises of the sort have been turned back in succession. China alone had the entree to Lhassa, and her caravans have traded there for many years without interruption, but no others have been tolerated by the Tibetens. Recently, reports were received indicating that the Anglo-Indian Government had in preparation an important mission to Tibet, and that an advance guard of the mission had already set out, its destination being presumably the city of Lhassa, so rarely seen by strangers, in order to arrange, in a satisfactory manner, certain matters of communication and commerce on which the Indian Government had addressed the Tibetan authorities, but to which no satisfactory reply had been forthcoming. Further news came by way of Pekin, where a communication from the Chinese resident in Lhassa appeared in the Pekin Gazette, the imperial resident in Tibet stating that owing to the receipt of urgent news from the frontier, he had summoned the State councilors and explained that England intended coming with troops to Tibet, "her determination being due to the opposition shown last year by the State councilors to any British officials entering the country to make friendly arrangements for the regulation of various boundary and commercial questions."

The Prime Minister of the bordering independent State of Nepal addressed the Tibetan Government in these words:

Understand it well; for the British Government does not appear to have acted in an improper or high handed manner in this matter, but is simply trying to have the treaty conditions fulfilled, to which everybody has a right, and it is against the treaty as well as against all morality or policy to allow matters to drift, and to regard as enemies the officers of such a powerful Government who have come to enforce such rights.

In July last, says a writer in the London Sphere, the Anglo-British mission, escorted by 300 Sikhs and a Maxim, reached Khambajong, on the border of Tibet. No reply was received from the Dalai Lama to the message announcing the arrival of the mission, but Colonel Younghusband was met by subordinate officials, who refused to receive the British unless they retired into Indian Territory. This Colonel Younghusband refused to do, and he fortified the position where the mission was encamped. Then the warlike reports from Lhasa having given strong reasons for the belief that a peaceful solution of the questions under discussion would be unlikely, Colonel Younghusband was summoned from Khambajong to confer with the Viceroy at Simla. It was then decided to send a considerable military force into Tibet, under the command of Colonel MacDonald, and all preparations are now being made with that end in view.

On the borders of Tibet live the people known as Bhootians, who call Tibet by their own name, Bhot. Its own people call it by another name, Cheen; China being known as Ma Cheen (the "great Cheen"). Tibet is the most priest-ridden country in the world, and for this the inhabitants have to thank an ancient king, who married two wives—the one a princess from Nepal and the other from China, and these peoples, their respective creeds, Hinduism and Buddhism. There is a vast desert to the northwest of Lhassa which the Ram Bahadur states is impassable, and thus forms another barrier. The women are polyandrous. The ecclesiastical power is everywhere in Tibet, and under its government the natural development of the country has been arrested for several centuries. The Lamas, or priests, are at heart more degraded than pretend. It has been said that: "the whole religious world of Tibet is one vast organized system of hypocrisy; the old pagan beliefs continue to all practical purposes being covered with a veneer of Buddhism. Though there is no resemblance in dogma there are strange coincidences between western religions and the Tibetan ritualistic customs, which include the use of the mitre, Church lights, holy water, vestments, bells, rosary and [illegible]

A GOOD OLD AGE

A SERMON FOR THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR

By REV. FRANK W. GUNSAULUS, D.D.

Died in a good old age.—Genesis 25:8.
Being such an one as Paul the aged.—Philemon 1:9.

I GREET you at the close of another year, as companions and friends who are growing old. The baby whom you just left at home gave you hints of his oncoming antiquity, as he spoke your name for the first time, or laughed without mechanical intervention of yours; and you were proud of thinking of him while he thus accumulated testimony of your own advancing age. You have caressed your little girl this morning because of the half-humorous signs she has given you of the coming woman. Your boy attracted your applause on the way hither, by his effort to be manly, if only that he rejoiced to be out of dresses. It was a kind way of telling you that he was growing old.

The hundreds of the young men and women who have already learned the paths of trade and the movements of the world, or who have found their ways by means of books into other centuries, and along by other temples in their student life—the ones we are proudest of—have won our laurels by witnessing, in their very victories, to an advance toward white hairs and wrinkled foreheads. No other characteristic of human life can make this less severely true for all of us—our yesterdays have made us old.

The Decaying Temple

It is, however, the testimony of life to a brighter truth than such musing would put beneath our careers, and that brighter truth is a part of the sentence which used to hang in Sir William Hamilton's lecture room: "There is nothing great in man but mind." Old age makes pathetic witness as the castle goes to pieces, revealing such splendid plans, and such noble labors, of its being for these years of growth and decline a temple for the soul-treasure about which it came to be. If man were physical only, old age would be a self-conscious woe.

Old age, looked at from the standpoint of youth, is a tomb, sometimes poor and unmarked, with no clambering vines about it, to hide its ghastliness, and with not a single tearful visitor. It is a tomb, sometimes rich with architectural splendor, written over with memories; covered with lovely vines, and crowded about with mourners; a tomb, nevertheless, in which lie buried childhood's innocence and charms, youth's hopes and dreams, the power and fervor, the aims and plans of middle life—the treasure-house where helplessness is alone with useless riches. Is this all? Nay! Nay! Over the cold marble front of old age, the spirit of God writes the words of Jesus: "I am the resurrection and the life," and into this tomb which we dread, goes this Lord of life, to fill its every chamber with eternal youth.

In the light of Christ and his religion, every period of human life is instinct with particular privilege, and capable of reflecting a particular glory. Indeed, life seems oftentimes like a many-keyed organ, whose banks of keys are childhood, youth, manhood, and age. Shakespeare saw seven rows of keys without any one of which it is impossible to make the full melody. Certain it is, that God has blessed every stage of life with particular grace, and visited each era of our earthly careers with special benedictions. Man was meant to live his old age with the harvest of each preceding field, all of it sown as seed and ripening upon this last; and sin has done no more evident disaster than to have prevented every soul from gaining all the long culture of earth, a culture in which every lingering day should crystallize into wisdom and power, the experience of all yesterdays behind it. What are

The Qualities of a "Good Old Age?"

I remark, in the first place, that the prime creative force of good old age is faith. Abraham, who is said in our text to have died in a good old age, was the "father of the faithful." Paul, our other illustration, was, and yet is, faith's most distinguished champion. The force, in both men, which kept the heart-beats strong, full, and regular, in spite of advancing years, was faith. Faith kept the stream of life full of "the murmurs and scents of the Infinite Sea," and it had impulse enough to carry out the wastes. Faith kept in their souls, the persuasion that clouds which hid the sky and sun were affairs of the earth, and that beyond them were a clear sky and a cloudless sun. This temper of mind, this spirit of trustfulness, first manifested itself as faith in God. Abraham and Paul "believed God."

God is the reality after which all the tendrils of genuine faith run. An abiding interest in such a fact as the infinite God is itself a fountain of youth. There is such a vast distance between the limited finite soul of a man and the limitless God, that the mind which sets out seriously Godward is drawn into a journey which lasts through all its years, keeps it youthful with enthusiasm and active with hope. Winter time may leave flake after flake of white in such a man's hair, but the heart is so warm that it gathers no snows of age which it does not melt. Many a man never loses his youth, because into his spirit there came in early days a life which reached out toward the eternal God, and this ever-expanding life has given to him and because at eighty God is still expanding him by new revelations, there is no old age. Death comes; it detains him just long enough to exchange worlds. Victor Hugo said: "I shall go to work again in the morning." This realization of God is the one effective breakwater against the changes in life. If a soul has a keener perception of the changes about him than that soul has of the permanency beneath them, youth is clouded, middle life is pessimistic, old age is terrible.

Faith in God as the one changeless fact in all the changing universe is the spring of genuine youth. Man is by nature so sublime a creature that the only reality in the universe he can safely cling to, as changes in scene, changes in humanity, changes in himself come, is God Almighty. Get hold of the changeless hand; lift up your soul and let its tendrils of trustfulness twine around the permanent grandeur of the Great White Throne. Pessimism—that horror of youth, that demon of old age—pessimism, which binds its slave to his task of condemnation, and enchains his victim to the prison which has no sky, is on the track of every man or woman, who, above and behind all that man has done or may do, does not behold an Almighty Goodness whose name is God. Much we leave behind us; yonder in sunny youth a lover; away down yonder fell from your arms a little child; away there you behold the grave of a friend—so much more gone, but you have all if you have not lost God.

A Spring in the Desert

This faith in God manifests itself as faith in humanity. There can be no real belief in the future of man, here or elsewhere, which does not spring out of faith in God. On the other hand, a real faith in man flowing from a faith in the Father of humanity, bubbles up like a spring in the desert of age to cool the parched sands and supply the thirsty soul. That there is a divine meaning in life, in the life of the lowest man; that every force of the universe is set to make this concealed gem of good flash out its light; that every power of love in heaven and earth will ply its energies to the evolution of the angel from the brute; that it is not an even chance between good and evil with respect to his soul; that God has manifested his interest in this matter at an awful sacrifice—the man who really has these ideas at the core of his life will feel the renewals of hope day by day; youth of soul will be his forever, and old age will be an autumn time in which he may gather the fruit of his faith.

A "good old age" is thus an old age, which, by the influence of great ideas, has attached the gains of experience, each to the order, so that at last they have made life a unit. Experiences enough, we all have had, to have made us rich in wisdom. But, I fancy, they have yielded no permanent gain to us, because we had no place for the gains. They have been like beautiful gems; we have had no strings on which to string them, and one by one they have been lost. Noble thoughts are the strings on which we keep the events of life together. Ideas are pegs upon which we hang our experiences. The man who is surest to find, after awhile, in his old age, the most of wisdom, is he who has now ideas great enough to run all through his life—ideas under which he may classify his experiences. One of the great thoughts which has made many an is this: "God is the author and impulse of a great movement in the universe in which I live. That movement is the one fact which binds age to age, and is the soul of history. I shall league my life with that movement which runs so swiftly toward eternal good." To a young man who seriously puts that conception of life in his heart, there is no dolorous, broken age. He is moving with the youth and hope of God. He has none of the wretched self-consciousness of a man, who, like a fragment, has kept his life for itself, and feels himself thrown aside in the universe. Nay! He sings:

I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

If ever there was a grand old age it was that of Moses; yet the very beauty of his declining day came from that living unity which his life with its countless events had, and that consciousness that his life had been caught within the moving life of God in human history. When God was about ready to bury his weary body with funeral rites which he alone would attend, Moses looked back past the contentions and hosannas of life, past the plains of Moab, over Mount Seir, and Mount Sinai, through the wilderness of Paran and the wilderness of Shur, yea, through the Red Sea, back to that burning bush where his life got hold of a great idea—an idea long enough and strong enough to bind its days and years together, as the many leaves of a book are kept together by a clasp of gold, and at life's close his prayer was "for the good will of Him who dwelt in the bush." Into that age there had gone no hardness and forgetting of the truth which had kept life fresh and buoyant all along. The last day of the last year sparkled with the deepest meaning with which the noonday of life was made radiant. Moses had yielded himself at the burning bush to the sovereignty of a Master idea, and it bound the fragments of busy manhood and happy age into unity.

The Unity of a Long Life

I have two portraits of Waldo Emerson, who was, in some respects the finest soul of our American literature. One is a picture of strong manhood; the other a picture of weak old age. One gleam of beauty and power, however, breaks forth from both faces. It has given me again and again a perception of what his works reveal of the unity of his life—a unity whose strength was to be found in a great conception of life which was with him early and late, a silver cord running through the warp and woof of days and years and putting the last day in sympathetic belongings with the first. One great theme, like that theme of a few bars of music in one of Wagner's works, to which the calms and storms always come, to which the wandering ideas all are to return; a theme which rides on every wave and billow of sound and echoes in every silence; a theme of which the many involved melodies are but the elaborate outworking, possessed him. There is no old age to such a soul. He had been so in the habit of seeing beauty that through the chinks which the storm made in his house, as the blasts of winter shook it, he looked out for and saw only the beautiful.

Oh, let us save ourselves from a peevish, rasping temper of mind which goes down to life's west window, protesting every step and struggling against the setting sun, a temper which finally makes us sit down and count nothing but the snowflakes as they drift across the red sunset glow and pile up on our window sill. There is one security against listening to the moan of the evening wind, and that is to have such a perpetual morning tide within the breast that its minor tones are all prophecies of how surely the sun, which has just gone down, will make morning elsewhere. There is immortal youth in every good cause, in every genuine truth. He who has kept the society of good causes has their imperviousness to decay.

Allied to Immortal Causes

There is no such pitiful sight in this universe as a human being who has lived a life in a world like this, where right and wrong, truth and error, are in deadly conflict, who has never allied himself with the causes that are ever young, and the enterprises of the human soul which never grow old; who, on the other hand, finds himself, when he is near the grave, with a lot of broken dreams, rotten schemes, decayed plans, worn-out methods, mechanical appliances for human life, which were behind the times before they were dreamed of, theories of liberty and law which were archaic when they first came to him, the trumpery and garret gatherings for which there is no future. It is likely that we shall never see anything more dreadfully sad than an old age, sitting and gloomily berating the times and the men who see no place in the diadem of progress for the dear old paste diamonds which they have guarded so long. The weakest thing in the whole universe is a human being battered with the storms of years, worn and weary, pushing at a useless craft on which there are no passengers, a craft bound up stream. And that is old age which has its heart bound up with the progress of bad causes.

The elixir of life lies in one's ideal. If the ideal is high enough and far enough from our present achievement, and really true, it will furnish the wine of youth with each advancing year. Pity for the soul who sets his ideal so low that before he rounds the century it is realized, and he is left in age alone without an ideal. Get interested in fadeless ideas; set your soul on the success of immortal causes; save yourself from a grumbling, sour old age by fastening your hope in youth and in middle life on truths which will bring their brightening triumphs to your heart as you sit alone; then

> An old age, serene and bright,
> And lovely as a Lapland night,
> Shall lead thee to thy grave.

But this all leads me to say, that a good old age is an old age with a memory of a well-spent life behind it. Our experiences make our eyes, to a great extent. We look westward with a moral and mental eyesight which we have won, and which came out of the past, which is very clear to old age, as

It Turns to Look Eastward

The evil we winked at, clouds our vision later on; the good we wept for sympathetically, clarified our eye. This influence of the past, noble or ignoble, not only enters into character, and shows itself in weakness or power in this way, but Memory, who is either old age's angel or demon, paints it all over for the lonely soul.

> Youth longs, and manhood strives, but age remembers,
> Sits by the raked-up ashes of the past,
> Spreads its thin hands above the whitening embers,
> That warm its creeping life-blood till the last.

A good past is a perpetual source of pictures—a lasting book of suggestive sketches, jotted down so swiftly, yet so surely as youth ran away and age crept on—sketches that old age, with weird, artistic power uses, from which it may create mighty canvases, which memory hangs upon the solemn walls of the soul that its house may be beautiful. Memory, it has been hinted, has a sublime but awful function to fulfil when Age has come. She, like a precursor of the judgment day, gets the old man to go backward with a strange accuracy. She takes him to his very childhood with a magic power of recollection, leading him by the pathways and scenes which he had forgotten, as he thought, until the whole book of life is open wide, and every unconsciously written record read again. That book is one of "the books" which "shall be opened"—yea it is already opened. It is the soul preparing itself for the judgment. O, that with a dark and vicious past, the awful doom could not wait for death! O, heaven! that when a heroic true past is behind old age, thou sendest memory to re-create its roadways, and line them with the old sweet flowers.

> How sweet at the set of sun
> To gather up the fair laborious day;
> To have struck some blow for right
> With tongue or pen;
> To have smoothed the path to light
> For wandering men;
> To have cheered some fainting soul
> A little on its way,
> A little more earth's sorrow healed
> By something we could say
> Or something we could do
> To help a brother on his road
> Or warmer from their sunless lot
> Some lives to make more glad.
> I long—as the blood runs now

God help us all to put a noble past behind us for old age to wander in!

"A good old age" is an old age conscious of its privileges and duties—the everlasting time which we call years; a height for discovery of truth, and for large visions of God. The rough experiences of life have not taken away the telescope of truth, if the soul really loved truth. The rare calm of that lofty summit is favorable to a mind which has learned to respect itself, and has dared to be still that it might listen for God. The passionless atmosphere, where no dusty winds of youth's contending impulses rage around, and where the spring at the mountain top is so unvisited by blasts of vain desire that it mirrors the stars, is surely a truer medium for the delicate sounds and fine tints of the world about and beyond. Life can now be looked upon by one for whom the light is over. Illusions of youth, the "gilded baubles," and the hollow nosses the false hopes and the wandering rushlights—these are appreciated now at their true worth. Truth, which the soul always had an interest in for what it might buy or prevent—truth may now be studied and loved for its own sake; and her acquaintance may be made as one makes the acquaintance of another at the beginning of a long ocean voyage; as one whose companionship may be pleasant, and whose friendship may be useful on the other side. These are only some of the facts of old age which have made the psalmist of old sing:

> It is too late! Ah, nothing is too late
> Till the tired heart shall cease to palpitate.
> Cato learned Greek at eighty; Sophocles
> Wrote his grand "Œdipus," and Simonides
> Bore off the prize of verse from his competers,
> When each had numbered more than four-score years.
> And Theophrastus, at four-score and ten,
> Had but begun his "Characters of Men."
> Chaucer, at Woodstock, with the nightingales,
> At sixty wrote "The Canterbury Tales."
> Goethe, at Weimar, toiling to the last
> Completed "Faust" when eighty years were past.
> These are indeed exceptions; but they show
> How far the gulf-stream of our youth may flow
> Into the Arctic regions of our lives,
> Where little else than life itself survives.

Let us, then, fairly face the fact that to us "a good old age" means a Christian old age; it means an old age made graceful by the masterful working of God in the mind and heart. We need some one whom we cannot lose, who will also transform our losses into unquestionable gains, else old age will come to the grave a sighing beggar. God Almighty is the one fact and factor which Love can lean upon, when her heart is torn with the loss of others. God, as revealed in Jesus Christ our Saviour, is the one skillful artist who takes the defeats and disasters of life and molds them over into mental and moral power. The greatest privilege of life may be ours—to feel the inflow of God upon the

To Grow Young as We Grow Old

We need an indomitable hope, whose life in our late years is not strong with surrounding years, and stronger even against the enlarging sky as every period of life accentuates. Jesus Christ, as the accompaniment of God, comes to youth and middle age bringing with Him promises of greatness realized in the lives of men and women whose great hearts were in sympathy with Him. He will ever go to the utmost God that whatever human range against our faith we shall always be sure of the Fatherhood of the All-Good and the All-Strong. He himself is the Living Voice piercing the gale—the strong voice across the storm, saying, "All is well." Jesus Christ is also the manifestation of man. He comes to the youth so sure to be disappointed in many good and true to walk in his visions that no critic of new courage can chill heart who has once trusted him, and always see humanity at its darkest, humanity blest with God, and believe in man. Let us come to the fountain and to Listen upon unworthy aims. Only the consciousness presence of God can get us from event to event with blessing. In Christ we get the ideas and aims of God Jesus and aims which run through the first centuries and through to-day and on into forever.

A noble past is a sublime past or a past out of whose tears of repentance and the blood drops of Calvary have washed out the stains of wrong. Great tasks are best reserved for age's unwilling hands—the task of hopeful waiting, the task of finding youth's best hopes not in vain without sorrow. Great revelations come to age, above the discovery of the meaning of human life, the gathering of the sunset rays which touch one's life's west windows. Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. Let us get his loveliness pass to our souls. He is the light of the world; light for morning, light for noonday, light for eventide.

We have only to compare Cicero or Socrates with St. Paul to see the glory of Christian old age. Sin pardoned, passion conquered, hope strengthened and heaven at hand. Just a few more strokes of the oars, a little more sea to cleave with your breasting oars and many of you will be at home. It is said that a sailor, nearing the shores of the New World, instead of the story which the waves and skies brought him—that land was not far away. Birds came near and floated on the mild air, and at last perched upon the masts and sang their praise of the shore. Berries were seen in the sea, and were caught up from the waves and eaten by the happy sailors. Land was nigh. This is a picture of Christian old age. The heavenly shores are near enough, so that the rich fruits of the other world are within reach of the weary mariner. Angels of hope and benediction come to the soul and hover over the vessel of life and guide us home to land with the rising of the ship. May God help us all to such an old age as this!

of his officers, greeted me politely, and stepping into our wretched tent, took his seat on a bag of maize.

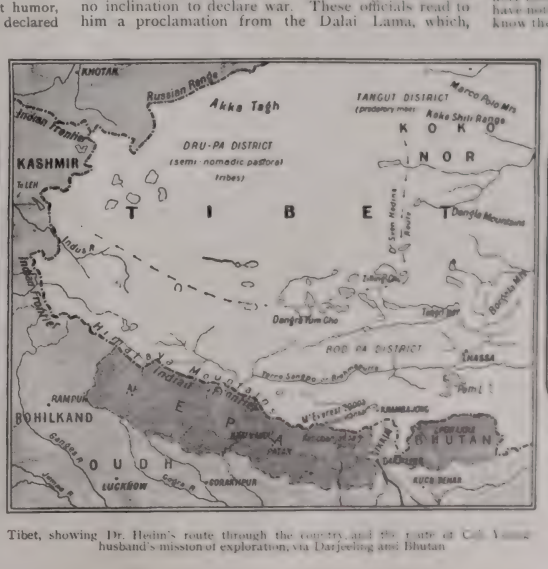
All these men carried swords, suspended from richly chased silver belts, ornamented with corals and rubies. They wore, further, gavos (or talisman cases) round their necks, and were adorned with rings, bracelets, and other finery, and had their hats trimmed with feathers. My honest lama was completely overcome by all this magnificence, and kept his eyes the whole time fixed on the ground.

Meanwhile Kamba-Bombo was in the very best humor, now that he had us completely in his power, and declared categorically that, no matter who we were, we must retrace our steps if we did not wish to have our heads cut off, at the same time drawing his hand significantly across his throat. I found it was perfectly useless to argue with him; he had imperative orders from the Dalai Lama. Thereupon he presented me with a couple of horses, a flock of sheep, and some provisions—gifts of priceless value, which, however, I was totally unable to return—and appointed an escort of three officers and twenty men to accompany us as far as the river Satyu-Sangpo on our way back. Although we had not had the good fortune to reach the "Holy City," we comforted ourselves with the thought that we did our best.

DR. SVEN HEDIN
Who explored Tibet recently

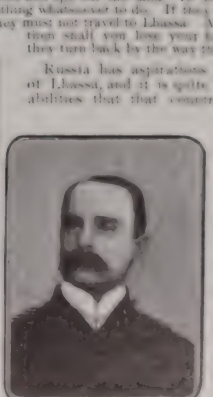
Dr. Sven Hedin, the Swedish traveler, two years ago set out eastward from Turkestan, gathering information as his large caravan progressed through northern Tibet. In the second portion of his journey, he left the caravan, and with two companions started for Lhassa, which he hoped to reach by forced marches in the disguise of pilgrims. He was stopped on his southward journey after camping in mountain passes 3,000 feet higher than Mount Blanc. Hadyeh Tsering and Yunduk Tsering, two of the Dalai Lama's ministers or members of his devashung (or council) in Lhassa, came direct from the holy city, bringing with them 500 mounted men, and against such a force Hedin had no inclination to declare war. These officials read to him a proclamation from the Dalai Lama, which, among other things, contained the following passage:

Let letters be sent with all speed to Narnia and Nakkang that no Russian can have permission to travel on any of the roads of Nankchen and intimate as far as the kingdom extends. Let letters be sent to all the frontiers. Watch the frontiers of Naktsang. It is absolutely necessary to guard strictly every part of the country. It is strictly commanded say that any European shall enter into the kingdom of the holy books and spy out the land. In your provinces they have nothing whatsoever to do. If they say they have books know they must not travel to Lhassa. And if they do travel from shall you lose your head. See to it that they turn back by the way they came.



Tibet, showing Dr. Hedin's route through the country and the route of Col. Younghusband's mission of exploration, via Darjeeling and Bhutan

Russia has aspirations in the direction of Lhassa, and it is quite within the possibilities that that country may yet take a very active interest in the British attempt to open up the Sealed Land.



Our New Year's Gift to Suffering Macedonia

The Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Cables $10,000 to the Missionaries for Immediate Relief Work

MACEDONIA'S cry for help has not been allowed to pass unheeded. It has deeply touched the hearts of our people, and from many States letters are now pouring in upon us, urging forward the movement to succor the refugees who are threatened with death from hunger and exposure on the Macedonian plains, and in the mountain districts. Many of these letters enclose contributions to the Relief Fund. Three remittances have already been sent by this journal for distribution by the Committees of Amercan missionaries and native pastors in Macedonia, and on the Bulgarian border. The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in accordance with his usual custom, in cases of great urgency, and to save human life and avert suffering, has personally advanced Ten Thousand Dollars, in anticipation of contributions which now amount to less than half of that sum. This money Dr. Klopsch has cabled to the missionaries and native pastors as the New Year's gift of Christian America to the suffering Christian people of Macedonia. It will be immediately applied in the purchase of food, blankets and clothing for the refugees at Monastir, Bourgas, Ochrida, the Deburtsa villages, and a score or more other localities. Under Divine blessing, it may be the means of saving many from perishing. It goes accompanied by the prayers of all the benevolent readers of this journal, who have the cause of Macedonia at heart. May it carry with it the richest blessings of the season of goodwill.

Letters from the workers in the field, received during the week, while they reveal the great extent of the need, also show that excellent progress is being made in the relief work with the limited means at their disposal.

From the Rev. Lewis Bond, American missionary at Monastir, the chief centre of suffering in Macedonia, we have received encouraging reports of the relief work. He writes:

We have dealt out and sent off 211,939 pounds of flour from our depot in Monastir, and 33,000 pounds of grain at Ochrida, Florina, Klissura and Kichevo. The blankets distributed number 2,316—all heavy, but of various sizes. We have given 897 thick, padded jackets, and 1,744 sets of underwear, and a modest amount of swaddling clothes. These figures are not large, but they embody a large amount of comfort to the recipients.

I take special satisfaction in supplying food or raiment to applicants who were comparatively wealthy a few weeks ago. Last week, one of eight brothers appealed to me for a blanket and flour rations. Their house in the village was a veritable mansion—a roomy, two-story affair. Now, he and one brother with their families, and the family of a brother who was killed—twenty-six in all—are crowded in one small room in a poor quarter of this city. Day before yesterday, three stalwart men from near Kastoria wept like children, as they tried to tell us of the burning, the massacre, the assaulting of their women, the looting, and the present dire distress, no one having come to their aid. I hope Mr. Brailsford will get there this week.

One of our native agents just in from Kichevo, says the people of that region are in the very worst condition. Only twelve villages were burned, but many were plundered of everything. A fortnight since, a band of Albanians from Debyra swept down on the village of Lackcheni, killed a man and woman, wounded a girl and lifted all the live stock.

At present we have eight regular distributing centres, viz.: Monastir, Ochrida, Resna, Kichevo, Florina, Zelenich, Biglishta, Kastoria and Klissura. Distribution began at Monastir October 6. 1,869 thick blankets have gone to Ochrida, 156 to Smildevo, 192 to Gyavata, 528 to Resna, 100 to Florina, 943 to various places. For the Biglishta villages 1,000 are being bought in Albania. The Mondon army blankets—between 3,000 and 4,000—are assigned to Kastoria and Florina.

The peasants of Kastoria are suffering most from exposure to cold, and the crying need there is bed covering. In one village of 120 families, eighty-five persons died within a fortnight of pleurisy and pneumonia.

Two hundred padded jackets have gone to Ochrida, 178 to Smilievo, 118 to Gyavata and 401 to sundry refugees. Our church women are still at work on baby gear, and many a mother heart is gladdened.

To-morrow we begin doling out charcoal to the refugees in this city—about 112 pounds a month to each family. One day last week, a woman appeared at our depot carrying her infant of only five days, and she came barefoot through the streets, which were muddy with snow-water. A cold wind has been blowing for several days, and the shivering people are looking longingly at our shed, in which is stored coal enough for 288 families. A little artificial warmth will be most appreciated, probably, in houses where there are small-pox patients. Mr. Brailsford is meditating starting a hospital in Monastir. Mrs. Brailsford has charge of the hospital in Ochrida, and it is an object-lesson.

The most ragged refugees come from the Demir-Hissar region, between here and Kichevo. Their houses were scientifically looted, and wearing apparel was stripped from the peasants, male and female.

The authorities allow us to send our native agents everywhere, and provide them special written permissions.

We pray for God's blessing upon every contributor, wherever he lives. L. BOND.

Rev. E B. Haskell (American missionary) has made a canvass of Deburtsa Mudirluk, Monastir vilayet, which shows as follows:

Burned villages, 17; burned houses, 1,300; houseless people, 7,330; total families injured, 1,336—7,563 persons; 4 churches and 1 monastery torn down; 14 churches gutted and defiled; 6 schools burned and torn down; 1 school gutted; 6 villages of 305 families and 1,779 people never had a school; 38 women atrociously assaulted.

Mr. Haskell calls urgently for food supplies for 2,206 children, and for 2,079 blankets.

Rev. D. N. Furnajieff, one of the native pastors now visiting the United States in behalf of the Macedonians, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

During the past summer the Macedonians have suffered tortures, outrages, and losses; but the winter brings a worse tale of woe, with its cold and snow, upon multitudes who have lost their homes, clothes, and crops. The present great need, therefore, is for clothing, bed covering, and food, while the native sources of supply are exceedingly scanty, and the government will do nothing for the refugees.

The missionaries and the native pastors, with the pastors' wives, understand the situation well, and their letters speak of terrible sufferings and destitution.

The younger generation and the older people of both sexes are entirely helpless. Unless provided for, they will find quarters only in the fields, and amid sheltering trees and rocks. Bear in mind that now the mountains and some of the valleys of Macedonia are covered with snow, which makes the sufferings all the more keen. Exposed to the cold weather, among many companies of refugees, diseases are developing and spreading rapidly.

Some of the women of Macedonia are reported (by native Christian workers) to have despairingly prayed God that he might send some pestilence, that they might die rather than live in their present privation, beggary and distress. Truly, the lot of those people is a sad one!

Those in charge of the distribution in Macedonia of relief funds raised in the United States, are all Evangelical Christians, and they are peculiarly called upon, while meting out physical relief, to give also timely and needed spiritual counsel out of the Word of Life. Those distributors know well the needs of the women and children, all but naked and starving, who appeal for immediate relief and care. "Come over into Macedonia and help us."

MACEDONIAN REFUGEES FLEEING BEFORE THE TURKS THROUGH THE DEMIR KAPU PASS, TO RILO

A Picture of Macedonia's Need

BY ELLEN M. STONE

FROM a recent letter by A. G. Hales, special correspondent of the London Daily News, who writes of what he himself sees and hears in Macedonia, we take the following true picture of the horrible sufferings of men, women and children there. Their husbands, brothers, and sons killed, multitudes of them; their homes looted, and then destroyed; nothing remains for the survivors who are anywhere within reach of free Bulgaria—even though weeks of such fearful traveling as is here depicted intervenes—but to try to reach it, and at least die in freedom. Twenty-five thousand have succeeded in this attempt, it is estimated, but two hundred and twenty-five thousand remain in such utter destitution, in other parts of Macedonia and Thrace, and await a morsel of bread and a rude covering at night, from the hands of American missionaries and of their great-hearted coadjutors from Great Britain.

Let hearts speak out, and great gifts be sent from our abundance in this land, to save lives in Macedonia. Do it quickly. ELLEN M. STONE.

Mr. Hales' Letter

Just before reaching the border we fell in with sixty-four refugees, thirty-seven women, nineteen children, and eight old men. They had nothing with them but the odds and ends of clothing that covered them, or part of, covered them, for not one, old or young, was decently clad. More than half of them were barefooted, the rest had sandals of kid, sodden with the rain and snow. They had a few morsels of black bread, but there was not enough of it to have made a decent meal for half a dozen persons. They were worn and emaciated in a most pitiful fashion, the great dark eyes of the children circled by black hollows, that looked like bruises, appeared unchild-like and wolfish. The skin upon the faces of the women was drawn until it seemed as if the cheek-bones would burst through the covering. Their lips were drawn back from the teeth until the wretched band seemed at first sight to be grinning horribly; it was the trade-mark of cold and famine. They were not grinning; the lips were blue, except where the cold had cracked them, as the sun cracks the rind on the pomegranate. The cracks were red with blood, open and unsalved, uncared for.

The feet of those who were unshod were a sight to make a strong man veil his eyes and shudder. Squatting in the lea of a flat boulder, to be out of the way of the wind, was a woman of about twenty. She had one child of a few months slung at her back, as the Australian native women sling their pickaninnies; in her lap was a curly-headed boy of about three years. When he saw me advancing with a piece of food in my hand, he held out his baby hands and began to whimper piteously, and when I gave it to him he ate it as I have seen dogs eat, clawing it ravenously, never once taking his eyes from the food. Bending his head to his hands, he gnawed like some untamed thing, until it made me sick to see him. I turned my eyes to the bare feet of the woman, and my flesh began to creep. Between the great toe and its neighbor of the left foot, and running halfway up to the arch of the instep, was a wound that gaped, raw, red, and angry. The bruised flesh was swollen, and looked blue-black except where the inflammation scorched fiercely. There it was crimson. The foot seemed almost split in two, and the frost had got to it, crushing the edges of the wound until it looked jagged and broken, like the teeth of a wood-cutter's saw. With such a foot as that I would have lain down and died like a dog in the snow, rather than face the terrors of the march. Yet this Macedonian mother, with one child upon her young back and another half the time in her arms, had struggled on by night and day, through snow and sleet, hungry, half-frozen, agonized. A man might turn and fight, and die gamely, but only a mother could do what this peasant woman did.

They had clustered like a flock of scared sheep upon a hillside, amidst a clump of hazel trees. They dared not light a fire, for fear of being seen by the Turkish troops. The snow that had lain upon the ground thickly had been partly turned to slush by the rain. Behind them lay the Perin Mountains, which frowned down upon Raslog Valley, where their homes lay in ruins. Above them the gray skies, charged with rain, lowered ominously. A bitter wind, with a promise of frost to follow, shook the loose snow from the bent boughs of the hazel and the pine. In front of them lay the Bulgarian border, where help, food, and shelter awaited them, for to the eternal honor of the Bulgarian peasant be it chronicled that no door is shut in the faces of the wanderers, no hearth refused them its welcome warmth. Out of his poverty the peasant gives with an ungrudging heart the mite he can so ill afford. I find here, as I have found in many another land, that in time of deepest trouble it is the poor that help the poor. The refugees cross the frontier, and the hard-working populace absorbs them to a very great extent; one stops here, another there. Women do not know whether their husbands are dead or alive; husbands do not know what is the wife's fate. Often both father and mother are ignorant of the fate of some of the children, and they go searching through the land, making inquiries. I have seen many women come to the members of our band, their great eyes, wistful with a sorrow too deep for tears, asking for tidings of little ones lost, with clasped hands, the twitching mouth, the voice that fills, and breaks, and dies away in a sob.

Those "Charming Infant Faces"

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Your Calendar has just reached me. Please accept my sincere thanks for that really marvelous premium. As often as I happen to have an eye on it, I am delighted with the charming infant faces, surrounded by those admirably executed butterfly wings. H. SANDRECSKI,

SOME OF THE WONDERS OF RADIUM

By SAMUEL G. TRACY, B.S., M.D.

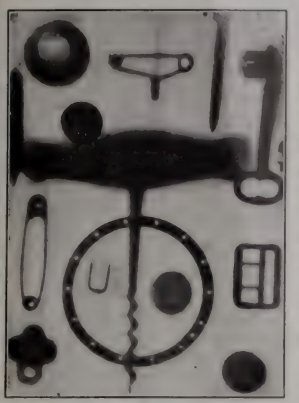

FIG. I. Radiograph taken with radium bromide. Onesixth of a grain, with a potency of 500,000 radioactivity. Photographic plate was wrapped in thick black paper, on which rested the objects here pictured.

RADIUM, the new, rare and wonderful substance, is obtained from the ore pitchblende. In 1789, uranium was discovered and precipitated from pitchblende, by a German chemist named Klaproth. In 1840, Peligot isolated metallic uranium from the chloride. In 1896, Becquerel, of France, discovered remarkable radiation from uranium. He noticed that all preparations of uranium emitted radiations continuously, and found that they were similar to the X-ray—they acted chemically on the photographic plate.

DR. SAMUEL G. TRACY

Following up the original discovery of Becquerel radiations from uranium, comes the discovery, in 1898, of polonium, by Professor Pierre Curie and Madam Curie who, investigating Becquerel's radiations, discovered from some samples of pitchblende, that they were much more powerful in their radiations than any uranium they had found, having four times the radioactivity of uranium (taking uranium as the standard of radioactivity). Naturally, they concluded that Becquerel radiations were due to some unknown substance in the pitchblende. They began a series of experiments, which ended in finding polonium, a radioactive substance, and later, in 1899, in the discovery of radium.

The pitchblende containing the largest percentage of radioactive material, which has thus far been discovered, is the Bohemian pitchblende. It is also found in Saxony, in Caldwell, England, and in Colorado and Texas in the United States. Pitchblende is not a common ore, and uranium exists in it to the extent of from five to twenty per cent. Radium is almost as rare in pitchblende, as gold is in sea-water. It takes 7,000 tons of pitchblende to furnish one pound of radium. From the above data, one can realize that radium is a very expensive substance. Chemically pure radium is now manufactured by the Société Centrale, of Paris, at $600 a gramme, or $2,000,000 a pound.

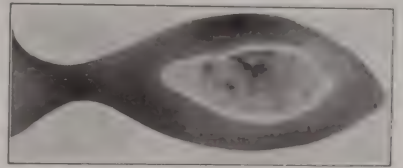
When I speak of the physical properties or other properties of radium, I mean the action obtained from specimens with a radioactivity of 100,000 to 500,000, the radioactivity of uranium being the standard. Professor Curie states that the radioactivity of radium is a million times greater than that of uranium, and it emits exactly the same quantity of Becquerel rays in liquid air (252 degrees below Zero) as it does in the ordinary temperature. The luminosity of radium chloride is greater in liquid air than at the normal temperature. Lord Kelvin says that the discovery of Becquerel radiation from radium and other substances has placed against the principle of conservation of energy the first question mark that has been placed against it since the principle was announced. Professor Curie and Professor Laborde, from their experiments, show that radium maintains its own temperature at 1.5 degrees C. above its surroundings. This is equal to stating that pure radium salt evolves enough heat to more than melt its own weight of ice every hour. This evolution of heat is going on constantly without any apparent source, and for an indefinite period, leaving the radium, at the end of months, as potent as it was in the beginning. This same statement applies to the luminous and other rays which it emits. An examination of radium, after long periods of activity, shows no change. The weight is practically the same. There is no molecular, chemical, microscopical, or spectroscopical change noticeable. The source of this heat energy is a mystery to all scientists. Rays from radium act like the X-ray. They will penetrate opaque substances and decompose the silver salts on a photographic plate; they take a much longer time, however, to take a photograph similar to an X-ray picture. Radium rays will reduce silver salts, iron peroxide, and potassium chromate in the presence of organic substances. They color rock salts just as the cathode rays do. These rays can also change white into red phosphorus in twenty-four hours. Becquerel also states that radium rays have the faculty of making the air act as a good conductor of electricity. Dr. Rutherford, of Montreal, says that radium produces an emanation that seems to act like a gas, but that the gas cannot be collected and tested physically and chemically. Sir William Crookes says radium emits three forms of rays: (1) those identical with the cathode rays; (2) rays of true atoms, positively electrified; (3) rays which are very penetrating and thought to be identical with the Roentgen or X-rays.

In speaking of the photographic effects of radium, the author has verified the experiments of Curie and Becquerel. The photographs, or rather radiographs, pictured here were taken by one-sixth of a grain of highly potent (radioactivity 300,000) radium. The data concerning these radiographs will be found under each cut (See Figs. I., II., III.)

Several observers, including the Curies, Soddy and Hammer, have found that radium rays have a powerful physiological effect. If a small glass tube containing radium is put in a vest pocket and kept there for half an hour, it will produce an inflammation of the skin; if the specimen is kept in the pocket for several hours, it will produce a severe burn, but the physiological effects will not be apparent for ten days or two weeks. If these burns, which are similar to the X-ray burns, are severe, the ulceration may take from several weeks to several months to heal. Professor Curie, in recent experiments, introduced one-twelfth grain of radium beneath the skin of a mouse near the vertebral column. The result was the death of the mouse in three days. Tubes of radium placed in contact in the back of the neck of a guinea pig produced fatal results in a few hours. Becquerel shows that radium possesses the same power as the electric spark, or the prolonged action of the ultra-violet rays. He says that when seeds are exposed to radium rays for several hours, they lose their germinating power. Another interesting phenomenon is mentioned by Giesel, who pointed out that when radium salts were brought near the temples, or near the closed eyes, a sensation of light was produced.

Radium has the power to impart to properties the same qualities in its immediate neighborhood. It is called induced radioactivity. Professor Curie said it was almost impossible for hours to get rid of the radioactive instruments to make measurements after being in proximity with any appreciable radium. The author's blue paper has verified Professor Curie's observations in a similar manner the value of which may be of considerable importance in medicine. Into a glass bottle partly filled with distilled water and the sides of a test-tube charged I placed two hermetically sealed tubes containing radium. The first tube contained about one-sixth of a grain of radium bromide, with the high radioactivity of 500,000. The second tube contained sixteen grains radium and barium bromide of a low radioactivity (100,000). These tubes remained in the water twenty-four hours, and impregnated it with their emanations, imparting to it considerable radioactivity. This tube of radioactivized water remained standing in a rack in my laboratory for thirty-six hours, after which I used it to take a radiograph, the same as I would radium. It produced exactly the same results on the photographic plate, thus showing it had absorbed some of the same powers the radium itself possessed. As it is well known that the rays from radium have marked germicidal powers, it is reasonable to suppose that radio-emanized water will possess the same, although in a less degree. It may be used internally, and found serviceable as an antiseptic. It may be used in cancer of the stomach, dyspepsia, and other diseased conditions of the digestive tract, depending upon auto-intoxication. As a spray, this specially prepared water may be found useful in catarrhal conditions, and as a surgical dressing it may be applied over large areas, where radium itself cannot be used.

There is no doubt that the salts of radium, by their radiations, have a positive effect on diseased tissues, and, even at this early stage of experimentation, it certainly looks as though their use were indicated in lupus, and other forms of tuberculosis, rodent ulcer, superficial cancer, and some cases of deep cancer; in certain kinds of skin diseases, atrophy of the optic nerve, and partial blindness from other causes. In deep seated cancers, the X rays have, as a rule, not given satisfactory results. It would almost seem that, in the radium rays, which are more powerful and their emanations of radioactivity more penetrating, we have a new agent which is more likely to give better results in some of the cases which have heretofore been considered incurable. Dr. Oudin, of Paris, says that he has cured several cases of lupus with radium rays.



Professor Cassemburrer reports to the Vienna Medical Society no less than twenty cases of cancer treated by radium during the last six months, ending July 1. All showed more or less improvement, and two cases were cured. The author reports the following case of cancer of the neck. The growth began twelve years ago. At that time it was the size of a small bean, but now, after slow growth, two and a half inches long and two and a-half wide. The patient has been under radium treatment for only a month, yet in this time two-thirds of the growth has disappeared and healed over.

There are those among you blind who can distinguish light from darkness, and even locate the direction of light. Curiously, to these same eyes radium appears a luminous purple impression. Neil Gould discovered the interesting phenomenon that when a tube of radium was held to the forehead over the temporal region a sensation of light was perceived. I have verified this in my experiments on myself. We can well see that this same fundamental may be found useful in stimulating the optic nerve, in cases of optic atrophy, and perhaps in being of some assistance to those who are blind, but who still retain the power to distinguish light from darkness. Dr. Lassar, of Berlin, in a recent report, affirms that he obtained good results from radium in the case of two consumptive boys, who were almost totally blind. The following case has been under the author's treatment only six weeks, and results have been such as to make me look for marked improvement, and perhaps a partial restoration of vision. The patient is a man aged fifty-two, but the possessor of the optic nerve upon examination by the oculist. His vision was reduced to perception of light, and medical men pronounced the case hopeless. He came to me about six weeks ago, and I decided to try the radium rays. During the first treatment the radium was held [illegible] minutes. The second treatment was given on the fifth day thereafter. The patient reported that he discovered a improvement in his vision after the second treatment. The treatment was discontinued for [illegible] weeks, and after a few days' rest I began a series of experiments to find out the best method of treatment. At the end of three weeks' treatment his vision was restored to [illegible] of normal. At the present writing, after the lapse of [illegible] months, the patient reports that his vision is perfect, and that he can read the finest print without glasses. He has also resumed his business, which is that of a [illegible]. The patient is now under the observation of the author, and medical men, and will be kept under observation for [illegible] months, to see whether he will continue permanently cured.

It is well known that the bandage in the treatment of cancer is one of the most important factors in the treatment. We have used the X-ray in addition to radium on cases in which the X-ray seemed indicated. No attempt is made to [illegible] the [illegible] by the use of radium, but we simply [illegible] and [illegible] the natural [illegible] through a wound.

Inspiring and Beautiful

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—The book, How I Worked My Way Around the World, received. It is certainly inspiring and instructive. Is worth three times what it cost. The Butterfly Calendar is beautiful. Am delighted with both book and Calendar.

"THE ATLAS ALONE WORTH THE PRICE"

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—I have not heretofore been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but was tempted this year by the offer of The Crown Encyclopedia. It came yesterday, and I cannot do less than write you at once and say that I am simply delighted. I have examined a number of the articles, and find them, as they are claimed to be, thoroughly up-to-date, and astonishingly full and complete for the size of the work.

But what pleases me most of all is the indexed Atlas. How you are able to include this is more than I can understand. I have hunted through a number of New York's best book stores for just such an Atlas—that is one of a portable size with as many maps, and would gladly have given more than the price of this whole work for it. The maps are admirably clear and full. It contains many out-of-the-way places and [illegible] the [illegible] stances—omitted by so many others; and the index is a perfect marvel of completeness. I repeat, the Atlas alone is worth more than the price of the five admirable volumes. I shall be only too glad to recommend it at every opportunity.

A Happy New Year!

THE youth of the year is fitly wedded in common speech and common hope with happiness. For friends and kinsfolk we can wish nothing better than that they may not only escape grief and suffering, but be happy in the coming days.

Happiness has many phases. When we start eagerly forth on life's journey we ask joy, success, gratified desire, and fulfilled ambition. Later, we are satisfied with less glowing gifts: we are grateful for a secure position, for the chance to work, for the shelter of the roof, and the warmth of the fireside; for apples and potatoes in the bin, and wood and coal in the cellar; for the increasing probability that we shall arrive at old age free from debt.

Old age comes, and we spell happiness then with five letters, and call it "peace." No other accompaniment of advanced years is so gracious and so benign as peace—peace of body, mind and spirit; that calm which comes of a heart that loves God and humanity. Our Lord said, with heavenly emphasis on the words, "My peace I give unto you. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you."

This paper reaches an immense circle of readers. Members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S great family reside in every corner of the United States, Canada, and Mexico. It is pleasant to send to every home where the paper goes, heartfelt wishes that they who abide within its walls, may have heaven's richest blessings, and among them prosperity, gladness and peace, for a twelvemonth to come.

Our Duty at the World's Fair

AS one reads the story of the preparations which are being made for the great event of the coming year—the World's Fair at St. Louis, the wish intensifies that the best possible use might be made of the opportunity for Gospel work. St. Louis is expecting two hundred thousand visitors, including many from other lands. At such a gathering in India, Christian missionaries would be found proclaiming the Gospel in every available place, even in the heathen temples. In the home land there should be similar energy and earnestness. To the majority of the visitors, the Christian religion is familiar, but how small a proportion have made it the law of their lives! What a memory that would be of the great Exposition, to a man who there first learned the way to God through Christ!

The opportunity constitutes an appeal to the Christian public of the whole Union. It should bring united action, not only of the churches, but of the Young Men's Christian Associations, and of every agency organized for the propagation of the Lord's Kingdom. While ten million dollars have already been spent in buildings for the exhibition of American products, and arrangements are in progress to facilitate visitors in gaining instruction and suggestion in the arts of civilized life, there should be measures of a well considered kind taken, for imparting spiritual knowledge and quickening the spiritual energies. The very keystone of our civilization—the foundation of our greatness—is the religion of Christ. That fact ought to be avowed openly and emphatically in the ears of our own countrymen who will be at the Fair, and especially of those who will come from foreign lands. They should know how much the United States owes to the influence of the Gospel in attaining our present position in the forefront of the nations. Our achievements in art and industry, they can see for themselves; it is for Christians to tell them what has brought about the development of the national character.

If there is cordial co-operation among the denominations in this aggressive work, there will be a security against the propagation of "isms." It is Christianity, not a narrow creed, that should be preached. The doctrine of the Cross, and the power of Christ to save the soul and transform the life, are subjects that would be most effective with the people who will throng the city. They are subjects capable of inspiring any preacher, and there are enough able preachers among us to make it possible to proclaim that Gospel every day that the Fair is open. Temptations to vice and wickedness there will inevitably be, at such a time; let there be simultaneously the proclamation of the antidote. Let it be declared to every visitor, that this country believes in God, and that it acknowledges its obligation to him for its prosperity and advancement, and that it has an abiding faith in the maxim that, "righteousness exalteth a nation."

The Sin of Selfishness

"LOOK after Number One; get what you can in the general scramble; every man for himself,"—that is the devil which possesses the world.

A few years ago, the people on both sides of the Atlantic were excited over the mysterious and horrible Whitechapel murders. The reporter of a London newspaper was examining one of the places where these unhappy women had been killed and mutilated, and he expressed surprise that the murderer should have escaped, when the scene of the crime was in the midst of a crowded neighborhood, and where it seemed almost inevitable that some one should hear the screams or witness the struggle. A fruit pedler standing by explained the situation, by calmly saying, "It's every one for hisself down here." That is to say, in that neighborhood, everybody was so occupied with his own personal and selfish interests, that no one would trouble himself to help a fellow creature in danger, or to notice a life-and-death struggle going on almost under his very eyes.

Do you think that sentiment is peculiar to that quarter of Satan's kingdom? No; it is as old as Cain, and as young as the man who did a keen stroke of business yesterday. "Every man for himself" is the dominating motto of the world to-day.

Now, set over against such a principle and such a life that noble word of Paul: "I am debtor to all men." It is not merely my privilege, I am bound, I have given my bond, to serve all men. I owe every man a debt of service. It is a question of simple honesty. It is not for me to ask why I should help such or such a one; merely to ask that question is to join the party of dishonesty and repudiation. It is morally impossible for any properly instructed Christian to ask that question, as impossible as it would be for any honest man to ask why he should pay one hundred cents on the dollar, when he can make his creditors take less for his claim. Christianity lives and prospers so long as this single "gold standard" is maintained. We are bound to help every man to the utmost of our ability and opportunity.

Selfishness is satanic: unselfishness is divine. Let us cease living for ourselves, and by trying to make some one else's load easier, we will be traveling, however remotely and humbly, in the footsteps of Him who gave Himself for us all, and who bore the burden of our infirmities and transgressions.

The Christ-Likeness

THERE is no defacement possible for men or devils to make in this poor humanity of ours which is necessarily final. All the stains may be erased, all the false superscriptions may be removed, and, fairer than before, the likeness of God may be stamped on every one of us. Not here, where the transformation is never perfect, but yonder, seeing him as he is, our whole body, soul and spirit shall be changed into the likeness of the King in his glory.

In the famous mosque at St. Sophia at Constantinople, which was originally a Christian church, the guide points out to the traveler a place where there is a hidden face of Christ, portrayed by some early Christian artist. When the Mohammedan conqueror possessed himself of that noble temple he ordered all Christian symbols to be effaced, and this beautiful head of Christ was covered over with canvas, smoothly pressed down and adhering to the surface of the picture. But by gazing steadily at the canvas the visitor can assure himself that there is a Christian painting behind it. Perhaps the colors have stained the threads of the canvas faintly, or the interstices have been dragged apart, giving pin-point views of the picture; but there it is without question. When the Christian conqueror again enters the gates of Constantinople the covering canvas will doubtless be torn away, and this bit of early Christian art be brought to light and restored. In most of us, even when we own ourselves temples of the Holy Spirit, the Christ-likeness is only very faintly visible. It is the grief and pain of our souls that the enemy is not utterly driven out, and still prevails so often to hide in us the image of Him we love. But by and by the conquering King will be hindered no more; the temple will be all his own. And then his own hand shall strip away the last vestige of the sin that hides God's glory in the soul, and the resplendent image of the Lord shall be seen in undimmed and eternal beauty.

The Encyclopedia for a Busy Age

A Reader's Comment After an Examination of the Crown Encyclopedia

85 COLLEGE AVE., ADRIAN, Mich., December 8, 1903.

Proprietor of "The Christian Herald"

DEAR SIR:—I received yesterday the new and valuable premium, The Crown Encyclopedia, five volumes, containing over 3,000 pages, and I most heartily thank you for furnishing your subscribers such an excellent and useful work at such a very low price. As to the work itself, it will, I believe, come up fully to every claim you make for it, and will give great satisfaction to all who are fortunate enough to secure it. Your claim that it is an "absolutely fresh work," and that it is up-to-date, "revised up to the hour of going to press," can easily be tested. On this point I have already had the curiosity to examine it, and have found it, as far as I have gone, O. K. For instance, the article on A. J. Balfour refers to his pamphlet on "Insular Free Trade," issued in September, 1903; and the article on Joseph Chamberlain tells us that he resigned as a member of the British Cabinet in September, 1903. We read also that J. A. Dowie, in October, 1903, undertook, with a large host of followers, "a crusade against the devil" in New York City; also that George B. McClellan, Democrat, was elected Mayor of New York. The very new Republic of Panama is also described, and, referring to the Panama Canal, we are told that the new Republic declared its independence on November 4, 1903, and assumed all Canal Treaty obligations. The article on Adelina Patti tells us that she "made a tour of the United States in the latter part of 1903."

Among the many valuable and noticeable articles are those on George Washington, five pages; Washington, D. C., over seven pages; New York City, five pages; and United States of America, eighteen pages. We have also a most interesting article on the Spanish American War. In the article on New York City we read that, in October, 1903, "the new East River Bridge has taken the form and appearance of a nearly finished structure." In the article on the United States we get the decision, "given in October, 1903," as to the Alaska boundary; and are told of the deep resentment, thereupon in Canada. We are also told that, in 1903, J. G. Cannon "was unofficially designated for Speaker of the Fifty-eighth Congress."

The work is indeed multum in parvo, and, in this busy age, will find many appreciative readers. The print is large and clear. The ninety-six fine maps given are very clearly and intelligibly printed, and on fine paper; so that they can be easily consulted. As to the "Universal Gazetteer," it is one of the most valuable features of this very valuable work, and will be of great service. It contains 35,000 references, and gives location, present population, etc., of States, cities, towns, villages, etc.

Again, I most heartily and sincerely thank you for catering so enticingly and satisfactorily to the wants and tastes of your very numerous subscribers; and I shall take very great pleasure in recommending The Crown Encyclopedia to all my friends.

Yours gratefully, JOHN GREGORY.

P. S.—I also thank you heartily for the very beautiful 1904-1905 Butterfly Calendar. It is much admired.

Among the Workers

—REV. W. E. RUEDEWOLF and Prof. Harry Maxwell are holding union revival meetings at Arkansas City, Kan. Deep interest is manifested.

—EVANGELIST E. R. HERMISTON has been conducting a series of revival meetings at Lemoore, Calif. All denominations united, and large crowds attended to hear the Gospel. One hundred and ten publicly confessed Christ.

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., lately closed a revival at the First Methodist Episcopal Church, Sioux City, Ia. One hundred and forty made profession of faith. At a union mass meeting for men on the last Sabbath, over fifty requested prayers.

—TWO BUILDINGS, side by side, in Albany, N. Y., form a singular contrast. One is the Broadway Gospel Mission, in the front window of which are two open Bibles. The other is a saloon, with a windowful of bottles. In the Mission window is the sign, "Bible versus Bottles."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The New Chinese Legation

CHINA'S friendliness toward our Government is incidentally manifested in the new mansion it has just erected as a residence for its representative at Washington. The embassy is no longer to be located in a rented house, but has magnificent quarters which are the property of the Celestial Empire. It is a coincidence, not without significance, that our Government has also purchased land in the Chinese capital on which a home has been built for our Minister at Pekin. The cost has been $100,000 in both instances. Both are on plans prepared by American architects, and the Washington house has been built by American workmen.

Though the style followed is Elizabethan, a Chinese effect has been produced by giving the house a brilliant sea-green roof. The mansion covers an area 150 feet square and is three stories in height. The entrance is into a large hall, the centre of which is a huge dome rising to the roof. On the left of the hall are the two drawing-rooms, both decorated in yellow and white, one of them having green draperies and the other red. Teakwood chairs and cabinets, quaint screens, porcelains, elaborate carvings in ivory and embroidered silk hangings, indicate the nationality of the inmates. On the opposite side of the hall is a dining-room capable of accommodating forty guests. It has a great open fire-place, a beamed ceiling and the walls are covered with tapestries, having a general autumn-leaf effect. On the same floor is the minister's study. The upper floors contain the sleeping rooms of the family. In the rear, in practically a separate house, are the legation offices and the apartments of the Secretaries and staff. All told, the mansion contains about fifty rooms.

Sir Chentung Liang Cheng, the new Chinese Minister, is a man forty years of age, full six feet in height, and weighing more than two hundred pounds. He was educated in this country, being one of the 120 Chinese boys of good family sent to the United States in 1872 to be educated and learn American ways. He first studied at Andover and later graduated from Amherst. After spending seven years in his studies, he served as interpreter at the Chinese Legation in Washington for two years, during the regime of Minister Chang Yin Hoon, who was one of the martyrs of the Boxer revolt. Minister Liang, like his predecessor, Wu Ting-fang, is genial in manner, and fond of American customs. He intends to have his children enter American public schools, just as soon as they have acquired a sufficient knowledge of the English language. The Minister has seven children, but only three of them—a daughter, aged fifteen, and two sons, Arlu and Arok, aged seven and nine—have accompanied their father to this country. There are, however, several other children at the Chinese Legation. One of these is the son of the Minister's brother, who is a member of the staff of the new envoys, and there are, also, several half-American children, the boys and girls in the household of Yang Kwai, the Secretary Interpreter of the Legation, who, some years ago, married a New England lady. All these children have, by the wishes of the Minister, discarded Chinese dress and wear American costumes.

The erection of the two embassies, the one in Washington and the other in Pekin, aroused much comment in the Senate, and called attention anew to the fact that the Chinese Government is now represented at the capital of the United States by a man of ability and culture, who is in every way fitted to fill the position he occupies.

Defaming Himself

A remarkable case of self-defamation was brought into court a few days ago, at New Brunswick, N. J. The question involved was an application for a license for a tavern. It had originally been granted to the applicant, under the impression that it was merely a renewal of a former license, but when it was discovered that the license had been formerly held by a different man, it was contended that there might be grounds for revoking it. To the surprise of the Court, the applicant's own counsel argued for the necessity of the license, and called witnesses who testified that the applicant was a man of good reputation, and was therefore fit to be given a license. The attorney of such applicant at the usual conference was asked by a statement of the former holder of the license. He explained that the present applicant had promised to pay him one of the hundreds and half years a quarter at $1,000, subject to the condition of his being able to secure a license. Another question he had suggested to the lawyer, and in order to save the forfeit of his promised dividend had taken the unusual course of defaming himself to get out the license before granted. Whether that explanation was true or not, it was clear inside. There are many who would value their reputation at more than a thousand dollars, and, not even to

An Immigrant's Terror

The first case on record at the port of New York of an immigrant's refusal to proceed to his destination was reported a few days ago. The man, who came from one of the Balkan provinces, was duly passed by the immigration officials and received a railroad ticket for Cleveland, O. He was sent to the Erie depot in New York, to be put on board a train for the West, but turned back at the last moment. The interpreter who had charge of him was taking him to the gate, when the locomotive was attached, as usual, the engine bumped the cars and drove them back a foot or two. The immigrant appeared never to have seen that phenomenon before. He was greatly alarmed and would not enter the car. The interpreter, who could not speak his dialect, tried to reassure him by signs, but the man shook his head and would not put his foot on the step. Finally he went into the waiting-room of the depot and

BRIEF NOTES

OWEN KILDARE AT THE BOWERY MISSION

THE STORY OF THE REGENERATION OF A "LUMP OF USELESS CLAY"

THERE appeared upon the platform of the Bowery Mission the other evening, a very notable character. Owen Kildare cannot be claimed as a Bowery mission convert, yet he has shown so much interest in the work, and there is so much in his life that appeals to the feelings of those connected with the Mission, that they look upon him as in some sense belonging to the work. He is a veritable product of the Bowery. He is also a monument of God's regenerating grace. Eight years ago he was a Bowery "tough," a prize-fighter, a "bouncer"—everything that is involved in the wild, brutal life so characteristic of the Bowery under-world. At that time he was unable to read or write. To-day, he is a journalist of international reputation, within measurable distance of the front ranks of that profession.

Mr. Kildare was born in the top-story room of a tenement house, within a stone's throw of the Bowery Mission. His mother, a Frenchwoman, died in giving him birth. His father, a rollicking, reckless Irishman, having died three months earlier, the child was promptly adopted by a kind Irish 'longshoreman and his wife, who shared the floor with the Kildares. Almost as soon as he was able to walk, he was sent out, as so many tenement children are, to pick up bits of coal dropped in loading or unloading along the river front.

At the age of seven, Owen was driven from the home of his foster-parents by his 'longshoreman foster-father, in a drunken fury, and promptly joined the newspaper-selling fraternity in Park Row. Here he remained for seven years, and having during that time exhibited considerable prowess in boyish exhibitions of pugilism, graduated as the "Newspaper Champion of Park Row." In a short time he became a full-fledged pugilist, and was noted for the impetuous ferocity of his fights. The reputation thus gained secured for him many engagements in the Bowery Music Halls and sporting houses as an exhibition pugilist. He frequently occupied the position of floor manager, or "bouncer."

During one of the periodical reform waves that has swept over New York City in recent years, many of these notorious places were closed. Kildare was thrown out of work. He did a lot of "hanging around," wasting hours, days and even years doing nothing. It was during this part of his life that there came into it that touch of the Divine Spirit which resulted in his complete regeneration, and a life of abounding usefulness.

It is a singularly romantic story, and it is told in such a powerful manner in Mr. Kildare's recently issued book, My Mamie Rose, that the celebrated author, Hall Caine, has written of it: "I have read your story, and I have been deeply touched by it. Nothing more true or human has come my way for many a day. It is a real transcript from life, and that part of it which deals with the little lady who was so great and so ennobling an influence in your life, brought tears to my eyes and a thrill to my heart. I am not using any flattery when I say that no great writer would be ashamed of the true delicacy and reserve with which you have dealt with the more solemn and sacred passages of your life."

When Mr. Kildare first published his story in a condensed form, it brought him over five thousand letters of praise and good-will, and the amplified story in My Mamie Rose has brought him very near the front rank of modern writers.

Mr. Kildare, by his newspaper and magazine articles, has frequently rendered the Bowery Mission splendid service. Although he has often sat with me in my office, and helped me by his sympathy and counsel, he is so modest that I could never persuade him to appear on our platform until the other night. It was intermission time at one of our weekly concerts, when I startled the men by telling them who it was that was sitting by my side on the platform. Such a tremendous cheer went up that Mr. Kildare at once rose, and in a voice trembling with emotion, spoke some of the heartiest and most soul-stirring words a Bowery Mission audience ever listened to.

He told them in a few words of his regeneration and of the life-work to which God had so graciously called him. He pointed out the fact that when God came into his life, his first ambition was to go to work; that he accepted the first chance offered to him, becoming a dish-washer in a down-town lunch-room, at $3 a week. "It was unsavory work," he said, "but it was work, and left me time, in the evenings and on Sundays, to read books so well-beloved by me and then my only companions. My ambition now is to write, and I want to be a writer with a purpose. I want to tell the plain truth about men and things as I know them and see them every day, in the homes, in the tenements, in the abodes of friendless, hopeless men, many of whom were once good and respectable. I want to dedicate my pen, no matter how ungifted, to their service, that others may know, as I know, where fellow-beings begin to rail against God and man because they deem themselves forgotten. I want to show that, often, it is their hearts that hunger most, and not their stomachs, and that they, as well as others, who can feel hunger and despair, can also love and despair. I know there is a work in that field for me, and it is my ambition to become successful in it and worthy of it, as a proof that one of God's sweetest daughters has not lived and died in vain." No one will pray more earnestly for his success than the men of the Bowery Mission.

J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent.

GOSPEL OPPORTUNITIES ON THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA

THE CANAL CUT AT CULEBRA

THE CANAL CUT AT SAN PABLO

AT ST. CHRISTOPHER COLON

AT latest accounts all was quiet on the Isthmus of Panama. There was some talk of an invasion by a force from Colombia, but it was not regarded seriously. In any event, it was believed that the presence of American troops and warships would secure the peace of the Isthmus and prevent any movement that might make it the scene of hostile military operations.

As a measure for protecting the peace of the Isthmus, the United States auxiliary cruiser Dixie has landed marines and a supply of military stores at Colon. These will be conveyed to Panama. The Panama government has convoked a national convention for January 15 to frame a Constitution. In view of the threatening attitude of the Colombians toward U. S. Minister Beaupre, at Bogota, an American squadron will be detailed to convey our Minister from the Colombian port of Cartegena. This, it is believed, will be an effective object-lesson, and will duly impress the Colombian officials and people.

From the Rev. Joshua Heath Sobey, an American missionary at San Jose, Costa Rica, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter forwarding the photographs showing the present condition of the Panama Canal, which are reproduced on this page. The illustration on the first page of this issue, of the old Fruit Market in the City of Panama, is also reproduced from a photograph specially procured for this journal by Mr. Sobey. Mr. Sobey writes:

The need for good literature on the Isthmus was never so great as now. Sowers as well as the seed are needed in these republics. We have been on a tour down the coast to Colombia, Bocas del Toro and neighboring islands, where there are thousands of English-speaking people scattered, away from pastoral oversight; so a visit from a missionary with a message, and something to read, is very much appreciated. We could not get back to Costa Rica, the quarantine was so rigid. We were detained five months, and it seemed as though God kept us there. Help was needed so much; the poor people were heartbroken and sick after the revolution ceased. Their homes were demolished and everything stolen. The soldiers buried their dead in the yards of the houses. No wonder sickness appeared. Oh, how these poor souls received words of comfort and cheer and prayer. They were hungry for it, and God gave us blessing, and made our hearts glad.

We went to the Isthmus of Panama, and worked there, up and down, among the hundreds who are waiting (and almost starving), for the canal to start. In eighteen days we held twenty-one services, and blessed results followed in the conversion of souls.

I do hope you will at once urge on the Christian conscience the necessity of rising to the opportunity and giving the Gospel to the Canal workmen. Whether by the churches or individuals or both, the work must be done. There is no time to lose. A new republic has come into existence, and the treaty for the construction of the Isthmian Canal is signed. The Church of Christ should wake up, and, with business ability, promptly act. Locations should be made, suitable Christian workers secured, and plans formed for immediate operations. Men accustomed to the climate should be secured to pioneer the work. It would give me gladness of heart to assist in starting Christian missionary work among the thousands who will probably shortly be employed in that vast undertaking. The Young Men's Christian Association should send some of their best men. The evangelistic work might, if thought desirable, somehow be linked with this institution at the beginning.

There are only two Protestant churches in Colon—one at Culebra, and one at Panama. Their hands are now full. Do urge the importance of this work on the Christians of the United States. JOSHUA HEATH SOBEY.

The American Woman of To-day

WOMANHOOD remains unchanged through the centuries. Certain modifications of the eternal feminity appear in different countries, civilizations and historic periods. When we read the Bible with care, we are impressed with the fact that the functions of wife, mother and housekeeper in ancient times, were precisely those which women exercise at the present. Sarah, the queenly wife of Abraham, hastened to take meal and knead it into cakes, that strangers, who had sought her husband as he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day, might be properly entertained. Thus, to-day, any wife prepares or supervises a meal for the guests of the household, setting the table with the best she has.

The daughter of Pharaoh, coming with her maidens to bathe in the Nile, heard the plaintive cry of the little babe, whom his mother had placed in the osier basket and hidden away among the reeds by the river's brink. Instantly her woman's heart was touched, and the royal lady sent some one to bring to her the infant. When she looked into the little face, she was enamored of its beauty, and she hurriedly adopted the child as her own. So, to-day, woman is the almoner of all sweet charities; the presiding genius of hospitals and asylums, and the loving caretaker in whose arms little children are carried. She is the guardian and educator of childhood in its first years. The line of the Egyptian princess still has representatives.

When David and his band of outlaws were riding forward to take swift vengeance on the churlish Nabal, it was the beautiful Abigail who propitiated the angry chieftain, and arranged matters by her gentle, womanly deference, and the rich provision prepared under her own direction for him and his men. So, many a time, has wifely tact been stronger than the short-sighted moroseness of some sullen man.

In the day when Elisha, going to and fro on his preaching tours, or on God's errands of one kind or another, stopped often at the door of the Shunamite woman, it was she who prompted her husband to offer him hospitality, and who herself made ready for him the guest chamber with its needed furnishing of a bed, a stool and a candlestick, the very things which would be most necessary now. So, in those old days, was woman the angel of the home, the one who ordained and managed its various kindnesses.

Undoubtedly, the American woman of to-day, has a very much easier time than any of her predecessors in this or any other country or age have ever had. Take for example, the difficulties that beset daily living a century or more ago, to look no farther back. All the modern conveniences have been introduced in recent years. Before matches were invented, it was a matter of most urgent need to save the household fire from going out, since the lighting it was a matter attended by no small labor. Before the era of kerosene lamps, gas and electricity, most ordinary housewives, semi-annually, had to make their supply of candles, a work which taxed strength and ingenuity and occupied some days.

Sugar, which now comes ready for use in squares or cubes, was formerly purchased in the large loaf, and bits of it were broken off as they were wanted. Spices of every kind were ground in the home kitchen. Stationary tubs were unknown, and the weekly washing involved an immense amount of carrying and lifting pails of water and a moving of heavy tubs, which was a back-breaking performance.

The American woman may to-day do most of her work by the help of labor-saving appliances, which minimize effort and do away with a great deal of the drudgery once indispensable.

Where, in the olden times, the family clothing was wholly carded and woven and spun in the home, and every stitch was put in by the little needle in the mother's hand; at present, cloth of every grade, finer than the home could make it, may be purchased; and the sewing machine, with fairy-like swiftness, does the work that was once slowly performed by hand. Our environments have become luxurious, in comparison with the past, and, the humblest home of to-day, surpasses in convenience and comfort most of the spacious castles and palaces of the Middle Ages.

In still another particular, the woman of the present day has an advantage over those who went before her. Time was that the sons of the family received a good education, and the daughters were limited to the crumbs that fell from their brothers' table. In the Boston Latin School in the early nineteenth century, girls were allowed the privilege of entering, if there happened to be vacant seats not filled by boys. Many a gentlewoman of former generations, courteous and gracious in manner, and lovely in person, had received little more than the rudiments of the education granted freely to her granddaughters. She could, of course, read and write. It was expected that she would know enough to read her Bible. Her spelling was apt to be uncertain and her accomplishments were few.

The widest educational advantages are now open to all women, and we are really in danger of going to the other extreme, and somewhat over educating our girls, so that they shall reluctantly accept domestic cares and obligations.

In one very important particular of life—her physical health—the woman of to-day is far in advance of any who preceded her, both in this country and Europe. Modern science, modern comfort and modern medical skill, have combined to raise the health rate and prolong the lives of women. The time has passed when it was taken for granted that women must be delicate, fragile creatures, seldom well and usually on the invalid list. It is no longer considered elegant to be ailing. Out-door exercise and good food have given the American woman magnificent health. Women are younger at fifty now, than they used to be at thirty-five.

IN PENSIVE MOOD

Striking a key at random, with an absent, careless hand.
There floats to her thought a cadence that maidens understand.
A call from a distant lover, is borne to her inward ear.
And the tone of the random music brings the one she longs for, near.
Subtle the spell of music; sweet are the harmonies.
That a girl of to-day may waken in olden-fashioned keys.
Oh, love that sleeps in music, is swift to rouse from dreams;
And over the common pathway, far casts its golden gleams.

GOLDEN TEXT
"REPENT, FOR THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN IS AT HAND"---MATT. 3: 2

JOHN'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY: I was the only child of my parents, Zacharias and Elizabeth, the child of their old age. I came of two priestly lines. My father was a priest after the course of Abiah, and my mother was of the daughters of Aaron. One of my earliest recollections is of my father taking me upon his knee, and telling the wonderful story of my birth. How the angel Gabriel appeared to him when he was officiating at the altar of incense, and told him that his prayer for a son was about to be answered, and that his son's name should be John.

My father said the angel had many things to say to him about what kind of a child his son should be; that he should be filled with the Spirit of God even before he should be born; that he should never drink wine; that he should be a preacher, turning the hearts of many people to the Lord, to make ready for the coming of the Messiah. My father said: "It was all too good for me to believe, and I asked how I shall know what you tell me is true." "And then," said father, "the angel made answer: 'Thou shalt be dumb and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed.' And, sure enough, when I went out of the temple, I could not speak to the people who were waiting outside, and were troubled because I tarried so long in the temple." And then my father told me that it was as the angel had said: that for nearly one year he was dumb, and that when I was born, and it was proposed to call me Zacharias, after him, he wrote: "His name is John;" for he could not even then speak. But as soon as he had written the name, his speech was given back to him.

All through my childhood, this story was told me over and over again. I never tired of hearing it.

Illustration and Application

Let us survey the story of John the Baptist—all but his death—on which there is another lesson, and in it find for parents, and their sons and daughters, younger and older, the following helpful examples of what we ourselves should be. In John's story, we find: (1) The blessing of praying parents; (2) A child who was a Christian from his cradle; (3) A young man whose chief ambition was to make earth heavenly; (4) A fearless preacher; (5) A call of double duty, "Repent" and "Prepare the way of the Lord."

What is it like in the Bible?

Old Testament prophets foretold that before the promised Messiah should appear, an Elijah should herald him—a fearless, plain-speaking prophet, who would rebuke sin and prepare his way. We can all see that John was in his spirit and method another Elijah; but when Dowie, of our own day, claims to be yet another in the succession of Elijahs, the resemblances, seem to most of us less than the contrasts. The new Elijah's luxurious table and fine raiment and dictatorial spirit, are more like the characteristics of the Pharisees John condemned, than like the simple food and rough apparel and humble spirit of Elijah and John. When the first covenant was made, Moses was directed to prepare Israel by symbolic baptism of their persons and their garments (Ex. 19: 10-14); so the initiation of the New Covenant, by which the people were to enter into the Kingdom of God, was preceded by another general symbolic baptism of those who would be the true Israel, and receive or take on themselves the law from God.

What is it like in Nature?

Henry Ward Beecher speaks of John as preparing the way for Christ, as the ploughman prepares for the sower. "Before good work can be expected, there must be excitement. The turf-bound surface of communities must be torn up, the compacted soil turned to the air and light. Upon the rough furrows, and not upon the shorn lawn is there hope for seed." "Dirt is bound to grow somethin' or other," said an old farmer. "It's the natur' of it. If 'tain't trees or corn, it's briars or weeds. When I cleared up that wood lot, the ashes of the log heaps hadn't scarcely cooled, before up sprang a passel of jimson weed an' poke and alders. I knew I must get it in corn or grass to save it." John and Christ fulfilled the acted parable by which God taught Elijah, when, after the fire and the earthquake, came the still, small voice. John was the stormy, arousing voice of terror, that prepared the way for Christ's "still, small voice" of love. John was emphatically a reed shaken by the wind. Here is his picture, in a metrical psalm of more truth than poetry:

> Blest is the man in stable trust,
> Like Zion's mound who stands full just,
> Nor bendeth no whit, nor yet doth reel,
> But standeth forever, as stiff as steel.

The axe is the symbol of John, taken from his own preaching. He struck fearlessly at the very roots of sin in those about him when, after his arousing rebukes, he proclaimed the need of conversion, turning, repentance. All three of these words mean turn about, right about face. His hearers, even those high up in the Jewish church, were standing with their backs to God, facing towards selfish ends—wealth, honor and ease. To turn about would be to give up both sin and selfishness. The turning called for in repentance is negative, the turning with heart and life, from all known sin—the human part in the beginning of the new life. The turning in conversion is God's part, turning about a man's loves and hates and innermost preferences, so that he comes to love what God loves, and hate what God hates. This is reform at the root, changing the very desires, 'bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience that is in Christ.' As George MacDonald says, "When God's will is our law, we are but a kind of noble slaves, but when God's will is our will, then are we his free children."

What is it Like in Common Life?

> O living will that shalt endure
> When all that seems shall suffer shock,
> Rise in the spiritual rock,
> Flow through our deeds and make them pure.
> That we may lift from out of dust
> A voice as unto him that hears,
> A cry above the conquered years
> The one that with us works, and trust,
> With faith that comes of self-control,
> The truths that never can be proved
> Until we close with all we loved,
> And all we flow from, soul in soul.
> —TENNYSON.

John did not stop with the negation of repentance. That was to be considered only as a house-cleaning to prepare the way for the long-expected Guest, the Messiah. On the blackboard in the dining-room, where Alice and Lucy were playing, were printed in red and blue letters the words: "Prepare Your Hearts Unto the Lord, and Serve Him Only." Alice spelled the words out slowly. "I don't understand one verse," she said. "Mother, what does p-r-e-p-a-r-e mean?" "It means get ready," said her mother. Then Alice read the words again. "Get ready your hearts unto the Lord. I don't understand," she said. "Think it over," said her mother. "Suppose I should tell you to prepare this room for your Aunt Annie, what would you do?" "Why," said Alice, looking round, "I would pick up all the blocks, so they wouldn't be in her way, and take the books and papers and our boxes off the chairs, so she could sit down." "Yes," said Lucy, and "take that dish of bananas out of the room, because Aunt Annie does not like the smell of bananas." "And we might put some geraniums in the vases, because she likes flowers," said Alice. The mother smiled at her little girls. "I see you understand it," she said. "Oh, but," said Alice, "preparing a room is different from preparing hearts; and we could not do such things for God." "Why not? Don't you know he said that what we do for others because we love him and want to please him is the same as doing it for him? And there is a great deal to be done to prepare hearts for him. When we feel ourselves growing cross, and want to be sullen, or to speak rude or unkind words, if we would think about keeping our hearts ready for Jesus, and not letting anything into them that he would not like, just as we would keep the room ready for Aunt Annie if she were coming, wouldn't it help?"

"HE SAW MANY OF THE PHARISEES AND SADDUCEES COME TO HIS BAPTISM"

"Yes," said Alice, "it would." Lucy nodded her head. She did not speak as much as her sister, but, perhaps, she thought more. The afternoon was stormy, and the girls could not go out for their daily run, but had to play in the house. They were much disappointed, and found it hard to be good. Alice, especially, felt very cross, and snatched her doll away from Lucy, and said in anything but a pleasant voice: "What are you doing with my baby?" Lucy opened her mouth to say: "I didn't hurt your old doll, so there!" But she didn't say the words; she didn't say any words for a minute. Then she said softly to herself: "Prepare your heart." Alice heard her, and felt ashamed. She turned away and looked out of the window. In a minute, she came back and said: "I was cross, Lucy; forgive me. You may take my doll, if you want her."

Their mother overheard them, and said softly to Aunt Annie: "The children both understand their verse, I think, and are trying to 'prepare their hearts unto the Lord, and serve him only.'"

We ought to be better than John the Baptist, whose career closed when the Kingdom of God was only "at hand," for now it is in hand and heart. Dr. Joseph Parker reminds those who object to enthusiasm in religion, that in the New Testament the preacher is the herald, going up and down from east to west, crying, shouting with a ringing voice: "Prepare." He is the preacher who does so, who breathes through the herald's trumpet, and startles the stagnant air with shattering blasts, and says: "The King, the King." Another writer says: "The preacher in the pulpit must not fail to remember that he is a herald, to proclaim authoritatively divinely revealed truths and to testify well-attested facts, most surely to be believed, not an advocate to argue and defend some thesis or proposition; that he is an ambassador to make known the will and announce the message of the Sovereign who has commissioned and sent him; not a philosopher to speculate curiously concerning a theory or reason, however soundly, as to the origin or application of some principle in ethics or economics."

In the audience to which John cried, "Repent! Prepare!" were many respectable persons whose sins were hidden from all eyes but those of God and themselves, and their own eyes saw the sin but dimly, but John awakened their slumbering consciences. This recalls a modern case in which hidden guilt was uncovered and a new illustration given of the fact that character counts. Two sheets of printed bank notes disappeared from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Washington. The loss was discovered on the following day, thanks to the careful system of concentrating responsibility, and was traced to the occupants of one room, a mere handful of people. Each sheet contained four notes, and six of these notes were recovered within a few days, their possessor having passed them in spite of their lack of signature. The very best talent was put to work upon the case, but certain peculiar conditions baffled every effort to get proof against the culprit. What the secret service agents did get, however, was evidence showing that, whereas the rest of the group of clerks involved were of respectable habits, one of them was leading a thoroughly disreputable life outside of his office. At this point Mr. Gage, Secretary of the Treasury, concluded to try his hand. He sent for the whole party who had been under surveillance, and delivered to them a short address, taking for his text the value of character. His remarks ran as follows: "Circumstances show that this loss was not the result of carelessness, but a deliberate theft. The system of checks and balances in the Bureau narrows that theft down to this little group of persons. One of you took those sheets of banknotes. I do not know who the guilty person is, in the sense of having proof enough to convict him in court, but I have my very strong suspicions. I shall not mention any name, but I shall indicate a line of distinction which each can apply as a test in his own case, and then determine for himself whether he is the person whom I have in mind. All of you, except one, lead lives which you need not be afraid to spread open to the light of day. The one exception leads a life of which a well-bred dog ought to be ashamed. If character ever stood a man in good stead it does so now in the case of those of you who are good and reputable in your relations outside of your office. All who belong in that category may go to their work with the feeling that no suspicion attaches to them in the mind of the head of this department. The one among you who cannot stand the test of character which I have outlined, will know, without my mentioning his name, that I am satisfied he is the thief." A few days later, that one resigned.

The words of John, in every line, are a call to moral virility to courage and earnestness. He pictures God as not only merciful, but just "whose fan is his hand, and he will thoroughly cleanse his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner, but the chaff he will burn up with unquenchable fire." So John himself combines humility with fearlessness and intensity. His words call us from sin, his example from sloth. The strenuous virtue of John is in the following poem of Marianna Farningham:

> A little time for rest,
> And then—away
> There is a race to run
> Ere close of day;
> A battle to be fought,
> Conquer who may.
> High up among the hills
> The best things wait;
> Climb on and do not tire,
> The hour is late;
> The victor shall be crowned
> At heaven's gate.

STRANGE THINGS IN THE BIBLE

Suggested Explanation of Some of the Difficulties of the Ordinary Reader : :

WE owe so much to the Bible, there is so much in it that is plain and clear that it has the right to expect of us a fair consideration of the things in it that we do not understand. There is in many quarters a disposition to disparage the Book, to look for difficulties, to charge it with self-contradiction and to reject if any passage is found that is apparently inconsistent with some other passage, or with the general trend of the Book. We have no sympathy with any such disposition. We have no inclination to reply to cavillers, or to argue with people who are prejudiced against the Bible; but we do sincerely desire to aid honest students who are puzzled by difficulties that they have met with in reading the Book. Some of these difficulties cannot be removed entirely in our present situation, but we have faith to believe that when more knowledge is accessible these will disappear with the others. Some, however, have already been surmounted and enough knowledge has been gained to give us a clue to the solution of some others. A few specimens of these difficulties, and the principles adopted in trying to solve them, may be of service:

The inspiration of the writers of the Bible did not eliminate their racial traits, nor their modes of thought and expression. They were Orientals, and to this day the Oriental is fond of figurative speech and forcible imagery, that is not to be understood literally. They used expressions which were perfectly understood by the people of their time, as being figures of speech. Even we do the same thing. Perhaps, in two hundred years, our descendants, if they read the newspapers of our time in the same way as some of us read the Bible, may think that Americans executed unpopular office-holders, and produce as proof a statement in a daily journal of 1903 that by the decision of a President or Mayor, some official's "head has fallen into the basket." Or it may be they will think that candidates for office were murdered, when they read that an opponent "carried a knife up his sleeve," or that some candidate has been "stabbed in the back." No one in our day understands these expressions literally, but every one knows what is meant. There is much picturesque and figurative language of this kind in the Bible, the key to which is lost. We may be quite sure that there is a profound truth in the expressions, which is just as valuable if we regard it as being conveyed in imagery as if we insist on the imagery being literal history. People who choose to do so, are at liberty to insist on the literal meaning of every statement, but the man who shrinks from a literal interpretation, need not reject the truth conveyed, because he has been forced to regard the mode of conveyance as symbolical. One man, for example, may believe that a serpent actually spoke to Eve. Another may believe that she was approached by some mean grovelling temptation, such as beset men and women to-day. The lesson is just as forcible whether the temptation was in the form of a serpent, or in a less material form. It succeeded, as the world knows to its cost. With this principle in mind, some other passages which have tried the faith of earnest readers, may become plain.

The sons of God and the daughters of men (Gen. 6:2). There is no need to imagine, as some have done, that angels became enamored with human beings. In those days, as in ours, there were unions which were ruinous to character. Who has not seen a young man with high ideals strenuously seeking that higher life which befits a son of God, suddenly falling in love with a pretty face that belonged to a low character, and being all his life dragged down by the association to a lower level? Or there may have been, as more frequently happens, a reversal of the sexes. A good, pure girl marries a man who has no thought above the sordid affairs of this life, and she loses her high and noble aspirations.

The Lord set a mark upon Cain (Gen. 4:15). There have been many suppositions about the nature of this mark. The record of it is stated. It was given in response to the fear he had expressed that he would be killed, and was intended as a protection to his life. A special penalty was threatened against any who might kill him; but that did not entitle Cain any more than it would entitle a man in danger of being murdered now, to believe that his murderer would be punished. So some token was given him, that he might prove that he was the man specially protected. The Revised Version makes the statement read: "The Lord appointed a sign for Cain," which we must accept as a clearer rendering. The sign, doubtless, was not so likely to have been a mark on his person, as some mode of identifying him, either by word or act, which others would recognize.

Cain knew his wife (Gen. 4:17). Where did Cain get a wife? has been a question frequently asked. In the absence of any explicit statement in the Bible, we presume that Adam and Eve had other children beside Seth, whose birth is mentioned Gen. 5:3, and that it was one of these whom Cain married. It must be remembered that even if Genesis was written by Moses, a matter which is a subject of dispute among scholars, though so eminent a Hebraist as Professor Green, of Princeton, declared that he had no doubt of the fact—Moses wrote more than two thousand years after the events recorded. We must assume that he used the traditions current in his time, or that the facts were divinely communicated to him. In either case, it is evident that no attempt was made to write all the facts, which would have been a stupendous task. Like other Bible writers, his object was ethical, and he hurries forward to events having ethical lessons. He mentions the birth of Seth, because from him a new line was started discretely in contrast with the line of Cain, but makes no mention of other children, because there was no intention to burden the narrative with matters of mere curious interest. Seth was the ancestor of the God-fearing race, and having recorded his birth, the history concerns itself with his descendants, and ignores any other children. It is on this principle that the Bible proceeds, when, later on, it drops Esau and his descendants and follows in detail the line of Jacob.

The days of Methuselah were nine hundred and sixty and nine years (Gen. 5:27). Physiologists have contended that no human frame could endure so long as this, nor even so long as Enos and others, mentioned in the same section. It has been suggested that the years referred to were not such years as ours, but were merely lunar months, as the ancients were more likely to reckon periods by the moon than by the sun. This explanation, however, is untenable, as is shown by the fact of the birth of their sons. Cainan, for example, is represented as having a father at the age of seventy years. If these years were lunar months, it is obvious that Cainan was less than six years old at the time. We are, accordingly, driven to the alternative of supposing that the race, so near its origin, was much more vigorous than in later times or that the method of reckoning the years was different from ours. As numerous suggestions has been made, so the guess that the names in the list are not those of persons, but of tribes or clans. But the narrative is so personal that it is difficult to believe that this is a solution of the difficulty.

(Other passages will be discussed in a future article.)

A Most Entertaining Book

Dear Christian Herald: We find Cavalier and the books both entertaining. Those are the first, is a work of art and entertainment. The book, as you know, Miss J. Mott, by H. Rider Haggard, is the most entertaining instructive book that I have read for a long time.

Corn Starch in Bread Making with Receipts

by

MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

Wheat is the father of starch, and Kingsford's Corn Starch is now generally put on existing there are still many other ways not known to the average housewife in which this valuable product may be used to advantage. One of these is in bread making. A small proportion of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch mixed with the flour will make the bread much more light, wholesome nutritious and attractive.

Try it in the following receipts:

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD.

Sift together three and one-half cups of whole wheat flour, half a cup of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch and a tablespoon of sugar. Soften a cake of compressed yeast with three tablespoons of water and add to a pint of warm milk. Pour this into the sifted mixture, and when well blended beat it hard before setting aside to raise. When light add two teaspoons of salt and as much more flour as can be beaten in with a wooden spoon. Let this rise again and then beat out the air bubbles and pour into two greased loaf pans. When almost double in bulk, place in a moderately hot oven and bake about fifty minutes.

This is a very wholesome bread and easily made.

CREAM BISCUIT.

Sift together one and one-half cups of flour, one-half cup of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch, three teaspoons of baking powder and half a spoon of salt. Moisten with cream as soft as can be handled. Roll out on a well-floured board, cut in small biscuits and place in a pan, brushing over with melted butter, wetting the tops before baking. Have oven very hot, and bake ten or fifteen minutes, according to size.

OUR HOME MUSIC CLASS

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON XII., AND LAST

The Minor Mode.—Thus far in our studies Do has been the keytone or point of repose in a tune. We may now learn that any tone of the scale may be so made to predominate in a tune as to bear the character of a keytone and to give something of its own peculiar mental effect to the music. A mode of using the tones of a key which makes Do the most prominent tone may be called the Do Mode; a mode which makes La predominant may be called the La Mode. These are the two modes most commonly used in modern music. In ancient times other modes were used. Music in the Do mode is bright and joyous. This is the characteristic effect of what is called Major music. Music in the La mode is sad and plaintive. This is the distinguishing feature of what is called Minor music. Play or sing exercises 58 and 59 in alternation, ascending and descending slowly, and the characteristic effects of the two scales will be perceived.

Ex. 58. Do mode, Major Scale.

Ex. 59. La mode, Natural Minor Scale.

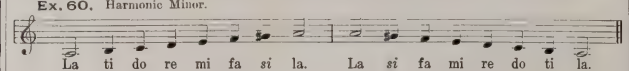
Our modern musical system treats the Minor mode to some extent as an independent Key. Its tones, beginning with La, are named by the numeral names One, Two, Three, etc. The syllables are not changed, thus Do is the same tone whether treated as One of the major scale or as Three of the minor. To give La the importance and effect of a keytone, modern harmony requires the use of Sharp So (Si) as a leading tone, a tone having the same relation to La that Ti has to Do. The use of Sharp So creates an unpleasant melodic interval—a step and a half—between Fa and Si. This is avoided when necessary, by the use of Fi instead of Fa, ascending, and So in place of Si, descending. The use of these new tones in the minor mode creates three forms of the minor scale, viz.: The Natural minor, the Harmonic minor, and the Melodic minor.

You should now learn to sing these different forms of the minor scale. If necessary practice them with the help of the instrument or another person's voice.

Ex. 60. Harmonic Minor.



Ex. 61. Melodic Minor.

A minor key formed upon La is called the Relative minor of the major key formed upon Do. Each major key has its Relative minor, and each minor key its Relative major. Major keys are named from the pitch of Do, minor keys from the pitch of La.

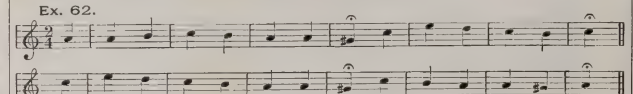
A minor key is represented on the staff as an appendage of its relative major, and is indicated by the same signature. Each signature indicates a major key and its relative minor. Thus the signature of one sharp indicates the keys of G major and E minor, G being the pitch of Do, and E the pitch of La.

The principal difficulty of the minor mode, to the singer, is the peculiar effect of the music. It seems so shadowy and unsubstantial that the mind has nothing to lay hold of and rest upon. The difficulty is in the music, not in the notation.

Ex. 62.



Look through your hymnal for tunes in the minor mode for further practice. You can generally tell whether a tune is major or minor by the last note of the base. If it is Do, the tune is major; if it is La, the tune is minor. Some tunes are partly major and partly minor. A tune may begin in one mode and end in the other; or it may begin and end in the same mode and have the middle part in the other.

This is the last lesson of the series, and I take the opportunity to express my appreciation of the many complimentary letters I have received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. I hope those who have found the lessons helpful will keep up their study and practice until they can read any ordinary church music at sight correctly and fluently. I would suggest to all, especially those who found the work somewhat difficult, to review the lessons from the beginning. I shall be glad to hear from any one at any time on matters concerning the lessons.

What a Little Boy Did

THIS is the photograph of a bright little lad of thirteen, residing in Athol, Kan. His grandmother gave him $1 to be invested for foreign missions. He spent thirty cents on seed potatoes last spring, and planted them himself. At "digging time," the crop brought him $3. The balance of the $1 (seventy cents), he invested in chickens, which have not been disposed of yet. Mr. J. Irwin Wherry, of Athol (who writes us on the subject), is personally cognizant of the facts concerning this young worker's way of making his mission money do such excellent service. His example is one that may inspire others, who want to do something for our devoted missionaries in foreign fields.

A YOUNG KANSAS WORKER

They Surpassed Expectations

Dear Sir:—The drop-leaf Butterfly Calendar for 1904-1905, the Red Letter Testament and the Crown Encyclopedia have all arrived in good order. Owing to the strong recommendation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in regard to these premiums, I had my expectations in regard to them elevated to a very high degree, and am delighted to report that they have surpassed my anticipations and have set me to wondering how you can afford to give so much for such a small amount.

Washington, D. C. J. PERSINGER.

Delighted With Her Premiums

Dear Dr. Klopsch:—I could hardly wait for the wonderful Pilgrim's Progress and the bewitching Butterfly Calendar to arrive. I dreamed with the faith of a little child about their fine beauty. Then, one bright day, like a good-hearted elf, you made my dreams in all their charm and splendor come true. My household sends true thanks for these artistic and delightful gifts. I am so well pleased.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

HOW TO PRAY

Help me, Father, at Thy footstool,
Not to kneel in formal prayer—
Not to kneel, because since childhood
Every day has found me there.
Make me come because I hunger
For Thy love, Thy Spirit blest.
Make me come, because there only
Can I find the perfect rest.
May I be so hungry, Father,
My whole life shall be a prayer,
Just a long, long talk with Jesus,
Telling him my every care.

Rome, N. Y. CLAUDIA EDWARDS.

C. C., Hamburg, N. J. "I know God hears and answers prayer. Thanks to him for answering my prayers."

Elcy. "I wish to acknowledge that the Lord has often answered my prayers. Lately, he has given me that for which for years I have had a desire."

Subscriber, Fresno, Cal. "'Answered Prayers' is the first thing I read. They are such a comfort to me. Our boy was gone on a long and dangerous journey. I asked God to take care of him and bring him home to us, and he answered our prayer. I have a great sorrow which I am trusting God to direct."

Mrs. J. H., Mulat, Fla. "I have a great deal of faith in prayers being answered. I have had prayers answered, even in small affairs. I ask the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to join me in prayer for the conversion of one of my loved ones."

E. G. C., Jamaica, W. I. "I can testify to God's goodness in answered prayers. Many a time when perplexed and almost in despair I, just like Hezekiah of old, open my letter before my Father and the answer comes."

Old Subscriber, Delaware. "I was in much trouble and prayed to God to make my life brighter. I can truly say he has several times answered prayers for me."

Subscriber, Forest City, Mo. "I promised if the Lord would hear me and save me from a great affliction that was threatened, that I would acknowledge it to the world. Now I redeem that promise. My prayers have been answered many times. I know that our Father hears us and will give us all that is best for us."

Subscriber. "I wish to acknowledge that the Lord hears and answers our prayers, even in small things. We humbly and gratefully thank our Father in heaven."

Mrs. M. E. H., Galesburg, Ill. "I add my testimony for answered prayers. Mine have been wonderfully answered. I wish to ever bless his Holy name."

Friend, Montreal, Can. "I, too, like many others who have testified through your columns, have been comforted and sustained through many hard experiences by a prayer-answering God. But for his mercy, continued sorrow and care must have broken me down. To him be all the praise!"

A. B. S., Philadelphia. "Our united prayers have been answered. Praise his holy name. He is truly a 'prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God, who can doubt it?"

C. M. S., Vt. "I wish to add my testimony to the many answers of prayer. I know we have a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God. He has answered many prayers for me, for which I bless his holy name."

P. C. L., Alta, Ia. "The Lord has answered my prayers several times, when threatened with danger, and has helped me out of many difficulties."

Mrs. M. B. O., Rockyford, Colo. "I want to add my testimony. If I were to write all the many times the Lord has answered my prayers, it would fill volumes. I take the little things as well as the great to him, and he never has failed me."

E. M. A., Jersey City, N. J. "My Heavenly Father heard and answered prayer in my behalf. I went to him and prayed, night and morning, for a certain thing to pass, and the answer came very soon. I wish to let the world know that he heard and answered me."

Mrs. J. C., Galesburg, Mich. "I want to add my testimony. Nearly one year ago I wrote, asking your prayers. The Lord has answered my petition, and now I thank him and you, dear friends of the prayer meeting, for all his kindness and care."

Reader, Coal Glen, Pa. "I wish to tell of God's goodness to me. He has answered my prayer. He will never forsake those who trust in him, and who are faithful to the end."

Reader, Rensselaer County, N. Y. "God truly answers prayer. He has answered my prayers many times in the past twenty-five years. I wish to acknowledge his goodness in times of trouble."

Mrs. M. C. R., Chicago, Ill. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer."

Reader, Greensboro, N. C. "I have been benefited by the 'answered prayers.' I desire to return thanks to God, who has wonderfully answered my prayers lately."

Mrs. M. A. B. "God answered my prayer, and I thank him, and wish to acknowledge his goodness to me."

L. F., Waterloo, Ia. "I know that God answers prayer. I asked a certain favor, and he heard me. One time while praying, my prayer was answered, and is my best friend. O that we might trust him more!"

L. B., Edinburgh. "A word of thanksgiving for a year of care and guidance in answering prayer. Oftentimes the way seemed dark, but as one came near, the path cleared, and the Guiding Hand was revealed. Now a dark cloud threatens a dear one, but I have besought the Lord for her, and he will answer, though not in the way I may think best. I hold to his promise, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee.'"

Mrs. E. H. B., Buffalo, N. Y. "I was in great sorrow and trouble. I took it all to my Heavenly Father, and now I wish to acknowledge his loving kindness to me, as the answer came."

Mrs. D., Elk Garden, W. Va. "I have been helped and strengthened through reading 'Answered Prayers.' I write to acknowledge answers to prayers which God has given to me."

K. E. L., Albany, N. Y. "I find great comfort in reading the 'Answered Prayers' column. I want to say, for the good of some discouraged one, that God does hear and answer, if we only believe and trust him."

TRUE REPENTANCE*

Amendment of Life as Well as Sorrow for Sin Comprised in It

TRUE repentance has always been a misunderstood experience in Christian life. Many young people have been distressed because they have never felt that agony of mind and that racking anxiety, of which they have read in the biographies of eminent Christians. They doubt if a conversion can be genuine which is not preceded by that experience. In many instances, those doubts are groundless. There is no uniformity in the Holy Spirit's work in conversion. Some are drawn to Christ by love for him; others are driven by terror at the consequences to themselves of their sin. One thing is essential, and that is that sin shall be hated and renounced, and that implies sorrow over past sins. It may not be the beginning, but it is sure to be an accompaniment. The more we know of God in Christ, the clearer views we have of his character, the more we are likely to grieve over having heedlessly or deliberately offended him. No man was ever saved by his tears, or his anxiety, or distress. It is Christ who saves him, and the man gets peace by believing the assurance that Christ gives him of his being willing and able to save him—in other words, by faith.

The signs of repentance, therefore, are regret and sorrow for past sin and an amendment of life. We make a mystery of it in our relations to God, but we understand it readily in dealing with children, or with one another. When a child has done wrong and asks to be forgiven, we grant his request willingly, and are glad that he is not sullen and obstinate. It may be that we delay assuring him of the fact, in order that for his own future welfare he may realize how evil is the thing he has done, or lest he be not sincere in his sorrow, but only be seeking to avoid punishment. But if he is really sorry, there is in the father's heart no animosity against the child, nor any reluctance to forgive. When a grown person has offended, we expect from him something more than an expression of regret. If he can alleviate the consequences of his wrongdoing, or atone for them, and shows no disposition to do either, we have reason to doubt the genuineness of his repentance. But if neither of these is possible, we regard the offended person as being inhuman if he does not accept the offender's sorrow as sufficient.

In dealing with God, the same rule applies, with this difference, that he sees into the heart and knows whether the repentance is genuine or not. Frequently, at the beginning, it amounts to no more than a dread of future punishment, but this is not true repentance. But God mercifully takes what we bring to him, and leads us on to better things. The turning to him for pardon, whatever the motive, is a beginning, and if the man is in earnest, true repentance will come. Then instead of being sorry for sin because of the danger it involves, he comes to be sorry for it because it is an evil and a wicked thing in itself—a thing to be hated and abhorred because of its pollution, and because it is an offence to God, whom he has learned to love. When a man has reached that stage, the memory of his past causes him keen sorrow, but with it there is loving gratitude to Him who has forgiven it. Blotted out? Yes from God's sight, but never from his own. If he can do anything to undo the result of his wickedness: if he can do some service to prove to God how sincere is his sorrow; how gladly he will do it! How carefully he will avoid sin, either that or any other! How he will love Christ, who suffered and died to make his pardon possible. Then, it may be years after his conversion, he manifests true repentance.

The Coat will cost you only $7.50. Made of genuine Cravenette goods with the Cravenette stamp on every yard.

Banking referees or will be sent upon request.

We have organized a Cravenette Rain Coat Club, the sole purpose of which is to enable a select few to take the benefit to secure for $7.50 the material for such a coat as has the highest standard ready made coat sold for $15.00.

By the Club's plan we cut out all the commissions and store profits. You deal direct with the manufacturer and get the cloth at the mill price.

The ten cents we charged when you wrote us is not to be returned but shall constitute the initial fee of membership of the Club. Send your name, address and number, and we will send you samples in different shades and a pattern for measurement.

This pattern is designed by one of the most noted professional designers in New York, and guarantees a perfect fit. It will be well to say to the uninitiated, that most ready made coats are cut to fit a person of average height and build. Hence, such a pattern would most likely prove to be a bungle elsewhere.

When this pattern and the samples reach you send us the shade you desire, return to us $7.50 and we will express a perfect rain coat charge prepaid. We will then forward to you by express the coat. Before sending the money for the garment, if you desire, you may have it sent C. O. D. subject to make the garment fit upon delivery, with the privilege of returning it. In this case send your best measure when ordering.

This offer must be accepted within thirty days of the date of this paper, as that is the output of the mill may be requisitioned to the demand for this garment.

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

CHAPTER X.—Continued

ESTHER greeted George with cheerful heartiness.

"Come in, George, come in! We're so glad to see you."

George shambled into the room awkwardly, and Douglas placed him in a chair. He was already becoming drowsy.

"I think perhaps he had better go right to his room," Esther said quickly.

"I'm sleepy," George said in a thick voice.

Douglas helped George into the room, undressed him and helped him into bed. In five minutes he was asleep, and Douglas went out, and related the evening's strange experience to his wife.

"Do you think God can save him?" Esther asked, after hearing Frank's story.

"If He can't, no one can. There is no help any where else, dear."

Esther was silent, then she spoke slowly.

"You will not think me silly, will you Frank, if I suggest something?"

Douglas smiled at the bonny face of his young wife.

"It makes no difference what you say, my dear, I have never known you to utter a silly word."

"That's flattery, sir. I have, in the course of my not very long life, uttered a good many. But I have been thinking that if George could be shielded just now, at this crisis, from his surroundings there at the Wycoffs, he might be helped. He has no home, and he is constantly tempted by the crowd of young men who board there."

"Perhaps we might find him some quieter place," Douglas said thoughtfully.

"Why not here, Frank?" Esther spoke quietly, after a moment.

"What! here! In our home? To spoil the—" Douglas spoke sharply, anticipating in one swift second, all that such a responsibility would mean in his idolized home circle.

"If it would help to save him," Esther said simply, "would it not be worth all it cost? May it not be one thing God gave us our home for?"

Douglas looked at her, and the tears stood in his eyes. "Dear Esther, little woman!" he muttered. Then he got up suddenly and went into the bedroom where the little boy was sleeping. He looked at the child a moment and then came back and kneeled at his wife's side putting his arms about her.

"You are my better half, Esther. For the sake of the little man in there, I am willing."

When Douglas called George in the morning, a feeble response greeted him. Going in, he found the boy quite sober, but suffering from severe headache, and with a rising fever.

"I know all about everything, Mr. Douglas. I'm sober this morning. But I remember your praying. Do you think God will forgive me, Mr. Douglas?"

Douglas' heart leaped up at the question. It was the same sober, genuine heart-cry of yearning humanity for pardon.

"Yes, yes, George. Never fear, God has forgiven you. Believe in him and trust him. Don't struggle. Just lie still and let God do what he wants to with you."

"I will, Mr. Douglas, I will," George replied, the tears flowing over his cheeks. "But I'm so sorry I have broken my promise and made you all this trouble."

"Never mind. It's all in the past, now," Douglas answered, cheerfully. "We're going to take care of you here for a while. You can't get up anyway, until you get over this fever. So make yourself perfectly at home. My wife is a first-rate nurse, and she is quite longing to have a patient; eh, Esther?"

"Indeed I am," cried Esther, who just then came in. "George, you are under my hospital orders now. As soon as the doctor permits, I'll put you on a diet of apple pie three times a day!"

"I don't deserve it, Mrs. Douglas," George answered humbly, and Douglas went down to his work that morning, singing in his heart a song of praise to the good God, whose ways are not our ways, and whose thoughts are not our thoughts.

During the weeks that followed, George was seriously ill. For several days he was delirious. Sometimes during his delirium he repeated conversations he had had with the young men—his companions. Several times Esther and Douglas had revealed to them little chapters out of the boy's tempted life, where drinking acquaintances had with devilish insistence tried to lure the boy back after he had given his promise to drink no more. His cries of "No! No! I tell you! Leave me alone! Take the stuff away! For God's sake boys, don't ask me! Take it away!" haunted Douglas for months. Long afterwards George told Douglas that on the evening when he was seen by him staggering out of Jake's place, half a dozen of his old boon companions had come up to his room at the boarding-house and tied him to his bed, while they forced a glass of whiskey down his throat. Crazed by this taste of the liquor, when released he had followed these miserable wretches out for a night's carousal. The sight of Douglas had partly sobered him. He had torn himself away from his tormentors and started after Douglas as Douglas turned around. The crowd of half drunken boys had caught up with him, and forced him into another saloon and made him drink part of a glass of liquor; but he had finally broken away, and in the state of intoxication he was then in, he had gone into the office.

When George recovered sufficiently to go back to work, Douglas asked him how he liked his hospital and his nurse.

"First rate. Couldn't be better," George replied, in the nearest approach to his old manner that Douglas had heard for many months. "But I can't afford to put up any longer at such an expensive place."

"It suits you, though?"

"Best on the road," said George lightly. "How would you like to stay right along, that is, indefinitely?"

"How?" George asked, vacantly.

"Esther and I want you to make your home with us a while longer, George," Douglas said with great kindness. "You can pay for your keep in part by helping take care of little James Edwards."

"You don't mean you want me to room and board here with—with you?" George stammered.

"That's just what I mean. Don't say another word, George. You're one of us, now. We all belong to the household of faith, thank God."

Douglas went out hastily, for George looked as if he wanted to cry, but didn't want any one to see him do it. But if there had been any lingering doubt in Douglas' mind concerning George's genuine conversion, it was forever dispelled from that moment. The boy showed in every word, movement and desire the marks of a regenerated life. And as he went back into the office and took up his work, Douglas offered a great prayer of thanksgiving for two souls saved for the Kingdom.

The delight of Quits in the conversion of George, was deep and touching. All through the boy's illness, Quits had come to inquire after him, and he kept his room supplied with fresh flowers. Then, when George was able to sit up and talk, Quits and he had the most undisguised conversations on religious themes. Unlike a good many young Christians, George astonished every one, except possibly, Quits, by a perfect frankness in the mention of Jesus and Salvation; and prayer and faith

REDUCED FAC-SIMILE—FULL SIZE, 20 IN. X 25 IN.

THE SUCCESS PORTFOLIO

WE are pleased to announce what we believe to be one of the most interesting and important features which will appear in any magazine during 1904. Each issue of Success, commencing with that of December, 1903, will contain a large four-page supplement beautifully printed on delicate, toned, proof paper and entitled, "THE SUCCESS PORTFOLIO." It will be so arranged as to be removed and bound with others in portfolio covers, which we will furnish free to subscribers on receipt of 4 cents (stamps accepted) for postage and packing. The whole set will form a beautiful art book.

In "THE SUCCESS PORTFOLIO" will appear, from time to time, a number of original double-page drawings made expressly for Success by leading American artists. Even more valuable features of the portfolio will be collections of portraits of the greatest living men and women of the world, grouped together in such a way as to be most interesting, both artistically and from a literary and biographical standpoint. A few of these groups are the following:—

The Great Preachers of the World
The Great Journalists of the World (January, 1904)
The Great Bankers of the World
The Great Women of the World
The Great Generals of the World
The Great Captains of Industry
The Great Statesmen of the World

A NEW YEAR'S PRESENT FROM SUCCESS

THE fine engraving entitled "A Market Report," represented in reduced fac-simile above, forms the first feature of "The Success Portfolio," and appears in Success for December, 1903. It is from a painting made expressly for Success by Roth, and will recall to many the days when the country store was the only village news bureau.

We are producing a limited number of artist's proof, remarque copies of this fine engraving, on special, heavy paper, 20 in. by 25 in., suitable for framing; and will send one copy, securely packed in tube, to Christian Herald subscribers who send us, on or before January 31, 1904, one dollar for an annual subscription to Success, new or renewal, and 10 cents extra (stamps accepted) for postage and packing. Special request for this engraving must be made, and The Christian Herald must be mentioned when writing. This engraving is copyrighted by us, and can be obtained only on this plan. Send your subscription at once in order to secure earliest copies taken from the plates when in the best "state," or condition.

and eternal life; and heaven, and death, and sin, and every other word in the Christian's vocabulary. He seemed to be no more ashamed or afraid to use these words in ordinary conversation, than he was to mention the things familiar to the office. Douglas was relieved, however, to find that the boy exercised common sense, and a healthy attitude toward everybody. He was never able to discover that anyone in the office was ever offended by George's plain, frank conversation on religious topics. No one ever called him a crank or a hypocrite. Two good recommendations for a healthy, wholesome Christian character. Moreover, George retained his old sense of humor, and humor in a young convert is the salt that preserves from morbidness and sanctimoniousness.

The following winter, when the legislature met at Clinton, was in some respects, the most exciting, and fraught with results to Douglas and his interests of any year in his life. The temperance sentiment out over the State, had spread with greater rapidity than even the most sanguine had hoped. Mr. Sage's temperance picnic was only the first of a large number of similar gatherings in the townships. The county constituencies had rallied to the election of prohibition candidates for the legislature. Men like Mr. Vernon had agitated for constitutional amendment from the pulpit, and men like Douglas had courageously used the press for the same purpose. And all over the State the liquor forces, and the forces of selfish politics like the Mayor and the Sentinel, realized that a crisis had arrived that threatened their kingdom. They fought the rising tide of popular feeling with all their might. Money poured into the State from every whisky State on its four borders. Threats were made. Voters were bribed. Men like Mr. Vernon who spoke out freely in the pulpit, were denounced as unworthy ministers, and the cry went up, "Leave politics alone and preach the simple Gospel." No one was louder in making this cry than Jake Lawson, and the brewers of Clinton. The brewers, especially, were exceedingly scandalized by the use of the pulpit for the preaching of prohibition, and total abstinence. Mr. Vernon, however, who long before this time had been appointed to a charge in another part of the State, continued to preach what he believed was the "simple Gospel," and he suffered in various ways for doing so, as all prophets of applied righteousness have suffered in every age of the world. Judge Butler left the church in Colby, and others went out with him. Mr. Vernon received abusive and threatening letters from the whisky men, and his own parishioners. Nevertheless he preached straight on, and to the honor of his church throughout the State, and of the churches in general, they sustained their ministers in the widespread agitation, and, together with papers like the Beacon, picnics like those organized by Mr. Sage, and the uprising in the country, succeeded in gaining a momentum of sentiment that was so apparent, that the liquor forces realized their desperate chances, and fought accordingly.

On the day the bill was to be voted on, to submit the question of prohibitory amendment to the people, Douglas had gone down to Clinton. Quits and George were at work in the Beacon office, talking over the situation. The very atmosphere seemed charged with a combination of tonics and explosives, and no one in Anderson County, or any other county, was talking about anything but the "bill."

"Do you think it will pass?" George had asked for the twentieth time.

Quits was naturally cautious and slow. "I think it will pass the House all right. I'm not so sure about the Senate. We'll probably know before midnight."

"Did you hear what Jake Lawson said the other day?"

"No."

"He said he would never close up, law or no law."

"The people will have something to say about that," Quits observed quietly. "You must remember, George, if this bill to submit passes, it means two years of campaign to get another legislature that will stand for the amendment. That means that we may have a county attorney, and a district judge, and a sheriff, that will have something to say as to whether Jake Lawson will close up or not."

"My! We're in for a pretty lively two years, aren't we, Quits?"

"We are, if this bill passes."

"Do you think it will pass?"

"I believe it will. I believe the clock of God's doom for whisky has struck around the world, and that this is the beginning of the end."

About ten o'clock that night in the Beacon office, George, who had hovered all day near the telephone, of which the Beacon now boasted, darted to it as it rang up again after a series of inquiries from different places asking for news of action on the bill.

This time it was Clinton that had called up the Beacon.

"Is this the Beacon office?"

"Yes."

"This is Mr. Douglas."

"All right, Mr. Douglas. This is George. Has that bill—"

"Tell everybody the bill has passed the House. It is now before the Senate, and will, without any question, pass with a good majority. Tell Quits—"

But George, in his excitement, had dropped the receiver and rushed into the press-room.

"Hi! Quits! The bill's passed all right! Pass the news along to Jake and the Sentinel. Send out and buy some fireworks and double lead all the editorials."

"Did Mr. Douglas say do all that?" Quits asked with a grin. But he was so pleased that he seized the galley boy, who was near by, and stood him on his head in a box of paper trimmings!

"No! What did he say?" George rushed back to the phone and heard Douglas calling.

"George! Say, Central, some one has cut in on me—George—"

"All right, Mr. Douglas. Here I am—"

"All right. Tell Quits to hold my editorial for a special edition. We'll get out five thousand copies to-morrow or next day. I'll call you up as soon as the Senate vote is declared. I think it will pass to its third reading and go through without further debate."

"Tell them not to put it off on our account, Mr. Douglas. Shall I ask Quits to put roosters at the head of every column? If we haven't got enough we can borrow from the Sentinel. They won't need them."

Douglas laughed. "Cover the Beacon with roosters if you want to. But we're not really entitled to crow until two years from now."

"But we don't want to save all our roosters till then. If we do, we'll—we'll—burst," George said.

"Don't burst until you hear from me again," Douglas laughed and rung off, and George got out every rooster, big and little, and held them in readiness.

Between midnight and one o'clock word came from Douglas that the Senate had passed the bill, and the minute it was known George dusted off the cuts and it was with difficulty that Quits could restrain from putting a rooster between every other display of advertising

"Save some of them for two years from now," Quits said in his usual self-restrained fashion, now that the first excitement had gone by.

"All right," said George. "We'll get some bigger ones then. These are so small they wouldn't do for more than spring chickens. What we'll need two years from now will be some of the prize winners a foot and a-half high like they had at the Poultry Show in Clinton last winter."

The passage of the bill to submit the question of constitutional amendment to the people roused the entire State to the struggle that now lay before it. The next two years witnessed a gathering of forces that could be characterised as nothing short of cyclonic. Men took sides who had never stood for anything politically before. The churches and schoolhouses were practically on one side of the question together with the Christian homes and rural districts. Whisky and selfish political ambitions lined up in the struggle with every weapon that could be forged out of money, misrepresentations and appeals to so-called personal liberty, and the battle grew in feeling and force as the final election day drew near.

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY SUNDAY SCHOOL

By W. A. NEWMAN DORLAND

AT a recent meeting of the Presbyterian Social Union of Philadelphia, Dr. Josiah Strong, President of the Academy of Social Science of New York, called attention to a remarkable change that had occurred in the attitude of the nations of the world within the short space of time embraced by one generation of the human race. He remarked that were the natural divide that determines the southward flow of the Mississippi River lowered but a few inches, that mighty "father of waters" would empty into the Arctic Ocean. Such a physical catastrophe would work most remarkable and far-reaching changes in the topography of the North American continent. And yet within the last twenty-five years, just as great and unexpected a change has been wrought in the relations of the several human families.

Up to that time, he pointed out, the tendency had been toward specialization; toward the separation and isolation of the various races and tongues. To-day the tendency the world over is toward unity and concentration. In the scholastic world this inclination has manifested itself in the development of the university out of the college; in the world of finance and business activity the great corporations and mammoth trusts have been evolved; and in railroading the tendency is shown in the monumental trunk lines that gird the great business centres and are the wonder of the world. The labor union and the concentration of capital in great syndicates are but momentous signs of the times. Through the powerful influences of steam and electricity, the nations of the world are being drawn into intimate relationship, and the day of petty things has passed.

Let the application be made in religious affairs. The wisdom of the serpent must be combined with the harmlessness of the dove. Enthusiasm and vigor inevitably result from numbers and concentration of effort. Throughout our great cities there are many church schools struggling through a precarious existence, and merely kept alive by the heroic efforts of a few devoted workers, who are truly performing prodigies of valor. Is it not strange that the signs of the times can be so clearly read in temporal affairs, but are obscure or even hidden in the administration of the church. What might be the result of a combining of these heroic efforts which, when isolated, are as vain beatings of the air!

In this line a suggestion is now offered, which it would seem, possesses the double value of concentration with preservation of church individuality. If we should visit the Sunday Schools of a certain denomination—the Presbyterian, for example, or the Baptist—in a given ward or precinct of a great city, we would almost inevitably be impressed with the vast expenditure of force and the comparative insignificance of result. Large, beautifully frescoed rooms, frequently with an architecture of the cathedral type, comfortably carpeted and heated, furnished if not luxuriously at least elaborately, well lighted it may be with artificial illumination, and with a large supply of all the modern lesson-helps, charts, and blackboards, and with organ, piano, or orchestral music, and showing a paltry average weekly attendance varying from 75 to 350 teachers and scholars. Let us suppose, for a moment, that in the given precinct there are four such schools of the given denomination. Let us further suppose that in a suitable building, centrally located for these four schools, the same weekly attendance at each school is concentrated, class by class, unchanged in any respect from the teacher down save in the place of meeting. There would now be one large gathering, a common Sunday School for the four churches of the given denomination, numbering from 900 to 1,200 scholars and teachers, full of enthusiasm, directed by one able superintendent, who could be supported by the former superintendents of the individual schools as his assistants or associates, with special supervision over their respective sections. Such a school could, for instance, be designated as the Seventh Ward (or Precinct) Presbyterian (or Baptist) Sunday School, claimed mutually by the four churches as their Sunday School, in which they would have an equal interest and an equal pride, and the support of which could be proportioned according to the original size of the individual school or the financial ability of the various churches concerned in its formation.

What would be the advantages accruing from the adoption of such a method? 1. Larger gatherings, with proportionately more enthusiasm, and consequently better results spiritually. 2. An economic gain, since the four schools concentrated in the one room, or suites of rooms, could be heated and supplied with music and lesson helps at a much less cost relatively, than if each were conducted separately. 3. The attraction of outsiders would be vastly increased, and the growth of the common school would far exceed the combined growth of the four schools conducted separately. Here would be a practical method of increasing the church membership in the various churches interested in the common school. 4. Such large schools, isolated from any given church edifice, would much more readily attract endowment legacies than if directly attached to one or the other church building. The school itself could thus become eventually fully endowed and self-supporting, and as a direct result of this development, the contributions to home and foreign missions could be materially increased.

These are but a few of the advantages that must result from such a move. Would it not be well worth the effort if only one or two such results could be obtained, and would not such a step be a large advance toward that concentration of effort that has proven so advantageous to a sister religious denomination?

BOOKS RECEIVED

Baby Days for Very Little Folks, edited by Mary Mapes Dodge. A book of "solid delight" for the juveniles—pictures and jingles, stories and verse, and all set forth by the best illustrators of the day. Quarto, 192 pages. Price $1.50. The Century Co., New York, publishers.

China's Book of Martyrs; a record of heroic martyrdoms and marvelous deliverances of Chinese Christians during the summer of 1900, by Luella Miner. This book deals with the exciting period of the Boxer insurrection and the events that followed it. It is a faithful and intensely interesting history of the experiences of our Christian missionaries, and especially of those who won the crown of martyrdom. The loyalty of the Chinese Christians shone out in those days in a way never to be forgotten. Pp. 512, illustrated, cloth covers. Price $1.50. The Pilgrim Press, New York, Boston and Chicago, publishers.

Arise, Take Thy Journey, by Henry Pennington Toler. In his preface the author explains that the object of this book is to announce that "the present city of New York is the New Jerusalem of prophecy." Pp. 113, cloth covers, New Harlem Publishing Co., New York.

The Ship of State, by Those at the Helm. This volume contains articles by President Roosevelt, Hons. Henry Cabot Lodge, Thos. B. Reed, John D. Long, Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court, Hon. Wm. R. Day, ex-Secretary of State, and others of prominence in the administration—altogether a notable book, timely, instructive and inspiring. Pp. 264, illustrated, cloth covers. Ginn & Co., Boston, publishers.

Misunderstood, by Evangelist H. D. Kennedy; a spiritually helpful book, dedicated to "the misunderstood ones" in every home. Full of comfort and consolation. Pp. 105, paper covers. Price 50 cents. William Bugg, publisher, Toronto, Can.

Raymund Lull, by Samuel M. Zwemer, D.D.F. R.G.S. This tribute to the memory of a pioneer missionary has evidently been a labor of love to the eminent author, who is better fitted than any other living writer to render it. Very little is known of that noble life, but Dr. Zwemer has been able to fill in many gaps from his personal knowledge of the field in which so much of it was spent. Its publication now is very timely. Pp. 172. Price 83 cents. Published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York.

King Lear, by Shakespeare, edited with notes by Wm. J. Rolfe, illustrated. Pp. 304, cloth. American Book Co., New York, Cincinnati and Chicago, publishers.

Jolliffe; Incidents of Peculiar Beliefs in Meridional France, by Maxwell Sommerville, Professor of Glyptology in the University of Pennsylvania. Illustrated by the author. Pp. 214. Published by Drexell Biddell, Philadelphia.

The Man Called Jesus, by John P. Kingsland. An exceedingly interesting effort to reconstruct a biography of Jesus from the four Gospels. The analysis of character, viewing our Lord as man, is reverent, and as exhaustive as is possible in the circumstances. The author firmly believes in the pre-existence of Jesus, and in the Incarnation; but shows that, excluding those from consideration, and regarding the merely human side, how grand and beautiful a man Christ was. Pp. 330. Price $1.40. Published by Thomas Whittaker, Bible House, New York.

Bobtail Dixie, by Abbie N. Smith. The autobiography of a dog which many readers have declared deserves to be regarded as a little classic of animal life, ranking with "Black Beauty." The author must be a lover of dogs, and will certainly make her readers love them too. Pp. 153, illustrated, cloth covers. Price 60 cents. Educational Publishing Co., 228 Wabash Ave., Chicago, publishers.

Thistledown, by Mrs. C. V. Jamison. A book that will entrance young readers, being the adventures of a little acrobat who has many ups and downs before the story ends. Illustrated. Pp. 275, illuminated cover. Price $1.20. The Century Co., New York, publishers.

The American Book Company, New York, Cincinnati and Chicago, has issued the following: Dillard's Aus dem Deutschen Dichterwald. Favorite German poems, lyric and descriptive. Edited by Prof. J. H. Dillard. Cloth, 206 pages. Sixty cents. Coleman's Physical Laboratory Manual, by Prof. S. E. Coleman. Cloth, illustrated, 234 pages. Sixty cents. The Baldwin Speller, by Prof. S. R. Shear, assisted by Margaret T. Lynch. Cloth, 128 pages. Twenty cents. Dresden's German Composition, by B. Mack Dresden, A.M. Cloth, 68 pages. Forty cents. Pearson's Latin Prose Composition, by Henry Carr Pearson, A.B. Cloth, 259 pages. $1.00.

Each issue is 24 pages full of stories and valuable facts—stories of romance by celebrated authors, some jokes, a page of music, poetry, brief sketches on many subjects, puzzles and captivating stories of every kind. You can get The American Home 1 year (12 issues) together with 10 complete stories all for just 10 cents. The ten stories are to get you started as a subscriber, because we know from experience that if once a person subscribes they will renew their subscription year after year, and for that reason we can afford to send you the magazine for one whole year for only 10 cents, and give you the ten stories into the bargain. The ten stories are by authors of known reputation, each one charming, interesting, instructive and laughable. A brief synopsis of the first one is given, and the other nine we name are equally as good.

1. THE ROSE THAT BLOOMED IN THE DESERT. By Helen F. Huntington. A delightful romance of a young girl who struggled against poverty, working in a cotton mill to earn the scant pittance that kept her mother, her little blind brother and herself from starvation; the wonderful sacrifice of the man who loved her, a sacrifice that is almost past human understanding in these days of greed and selfishness. But the sacrifice had its reward, and the story has a bright and happy ending.
2. THE TWELFTH AND THIRTEENTH GUESTS. By Don Mark Lemon.
3. SAINTS AMONG THE FLOWERS. By Waldron Fawcett.
4. THAT MARVELOUS CLOCK. By W. T. Caldwell.

THE HERALD OF CHRIST

A Nation Called to Repentance

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

THE coming of John the Baptist was foretold by Isaiah, and John knew that it was he of whom the prophet spake in the words, "The voice of him that crieth in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight in the desert a highway for our God" (comp. Isa. 40: 3; John 1: 23). He was the only individual in the New Testament, except the Lord Jesus himself, who was foretold in the Old Testament as a messenger of God. The prophet Malachi, in foretelling the coming of Elijah, the prophet, before "the coming of the great and terrible day of the Lord," refers to him (comp. Mal. 4: 5, 6; Luke 1: 16, 17; Matt. 11: 14; 17: 10-13).

How God, little by little, revealed to John the Baptist the mission to which he was called, we are not told; he must have come to the point of being unreservedly at God's disposal when "the Word of God came unto John, the son of Zacharias, in the wilderness;" and he knew then that he must go forward. Many Christians want to define, to dissect, to reduce to a system, a call such as this. It is impossible. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him: and he will show them his covenant" (Ps. 25: 14). There is a language of the Holy Spirit which cannot be reduced to writing, and this man, born full of the Spirit, knew by Divine instinct the Spirit's language.

"And he came into all the country about Jordan, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins" (Luke 3: 3). This was his first and chief burden: "Get right with God." Repent. You are looking for the Messiah and for his kingdom. "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. 4: 2). No repentance, no kingdom. It was a bold utterance. The priests and scribes were self-satisfied; his teaching militated against all the prejudices of the teachers and of the authorities. He took the risk: for his commission was from on high. The Gospel of Matthew tells us that he "preached in the wilderness of Judea." It was not only a prophet-voice, but a prophet-garb and prophet-life which startled the inhabitants of Judea. His raiment was of camel's hair, and his meat, locusts and wild honey—just what the desert would provide him without cooking. With such a vocation he did not seek society; he could not accomplish his work except he should be in all things a contrast to the men of his day. They lived for eating, drinking, marrying, planting, building, etc.; he lived for none of these things, but for his message, and for souls.

When God prepares a special instrument for special work he also prepares the ground where he will use that instrument. John had neither men nor money to help him. Oh, the pains we take to get audiences together, and the money and time which are spent in preparing for revivals! It may be necessary to occupy otherwise unoccupied Christians; but God can do without these means of getting up an awakening, which too often goes down again very soon. He had got John's attention in the desert. He had filled the heart, which was fully at leisure for him, with the burden of the Lord, and now he worked on the hearts of the people, so that, with no advertisements, no means such as we now have to get audiences together, "there came out to him Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins." Such was the awakening under this chosen forerunner of the Lord Jesus. And yet it did not last! The awakening died with the instrument which God used!

It was through John the Baptist that the first announcement of the kingdom which had been foretold to them was made to the Jewish nation. True, it was most unwelcome to the great men—the Pharisees, scribes, and elders—that repentance was a necessary condition. But how could Christ, God the Son, come to set up "the glorious majesty of his kingdom" (Ps. 145: 12), and reign over a people who had never nationally repented of their national sin in having rejected God the Father from being their King.

The Redfern Corset

Is the epitome of all that is excellent in corset-making. There are many styles adapted to different forms. We illustrate here but one, showing a REDFERN Hose-Supporter Model that conforms to the average figure. It slopes the hips and dips the form toward the front.

The same beauty of shape and excellence of ease are found in every one of the REDFERN models.

These corsets are boned with genuine whalebone, making a corset which it is a joy to wear from its adaptability to the form and its ability to retain its shape.
